Decid'ua (Membra'na), Decid'ua, Decid'uous Mem'brane. So called on account of its being considered to fall off from the uterus at parturition. A membrane, formerly defined to be the outermost membrane of the fœtus in utero; and still so defined by some — as by Dr. Lee. Chaussier calls it Epicho'rion; by others, it has been called Perio'na, Membra'na caduca Hunteri, M. flocculen'ta seu cellulo'sa seu sinuo'sa seu commu'nis seu præexis'tens, Decid'ua exter'na seu vera seu spongio'sa, Tu'nica exte'rior o'vi seu cadu'ca seu cras'sa, Membra'na cribro'sa seu o'vi mater'na seu muco'sa seu u'teri intern'a evolu'ta, Epio'nē, Placen'ta u'teri succenturia'ta, Subplacen'ta, Nidamen'tum, Anhis'tous mem'brane, (F.) Caduque, C. vraie, Membrane caduque, Épione, Périone;—prior to the time of the Hunters, called Cho'rion spongio'sum seu tomento'sum seu fungo'sum seu reticula'tum, Tu'nica filamento'sa, Shag'gy Cho'rion, Spon'gy Cho'rion, &c. Great diversity has prevailed regarding this membrane and its reflected portion. It exists before the germ arrives in the uterus — and it has been met with in tubal and ovarial pregnancies; and is occasioned by a new action, assumed by the uterine vessels at the moment of conception. Chaussier, Lobstein, Gardien, Velpeau, and others, consider it to be a sac, without apertures, completely lining the uterus, and that when the ovum descends through the tube it pushes the decidua before it, and becomes enveloped in it, except at the part destined to form the placenta. That portion of the membrane which covers the ovum, forms the Membra'na decid'ua reflex'a, (F.) Caduque réfléchie, Membrane caduque réfléchie, according to them; the part lining the uterus being the Decid'ua u'teri, (F.) Caduque utérine. Towards the end of the fourth month, the decidua reflex disappears. The very existence of a Tu'nica decid'ua reflex'a has, however, been denied. This last membrane has received various names. Dr. Granville, regarding it as the external membrane of the ovum, has termed it Cor'tex o'vi. It has also been termed Involu'crum membrana'ceum, Membra'na retiform'is cho'rii seu filamento'sa seu adventit''ia seu cras'sa, O'vuline, and Decid'ua protru'sa. To the membrane which, according to Bojanus and others, is situate between the placenta and the uterus, and which he considers to be produced at a later period than the decidua vera, he gave the name membra'na decid'ua sero'tina, (F.) Membrane utéroëpichoriale, Caduque sérotine ou secondaire.

Histological researches seem to show that the decidua is an altered condition of the lining membrane of the uterus, with a whitish secretion filling the uterine tubular glands. The decidua reflexa is probably formed by the agency of nucleated cells from the plastic materials thrown out from the decidua uteri; in the same manner as the chorion is formed in the Fallopian tube from plastic materials thrown out from its lining membrane. That the decidua reflexa is not a mere inverted portion of the decidua uteri is shown by the fact that the texture of the two is by no means identical.

It is believed by many that a deciduous membrane, Decid'ua menstrua'lis, is formed and thrown off at each menstrual period. Others, however, contend that it is the result of impregnation, and that it is an abortion of some days or weeks, the mucous membrane of the uterus being first converted into decidua, and expelled after the perishing or escape of the ovum.

Decid'uous Mem'brane, Decidua (membrana).

Dec''igramme, Decigram'ma, (decimus, 'the tenth part,' and γραμμα, 'gramme.') The tenth part of the gramme in weight; equal to a little less than two grains, French; 1·543 Troy.

Decima'na Fe'bris, (decem, 'ten.') An intermittent, whose paroxysms return every tenth day or every nine days. It is supposititious.

Declama'tion, Declama'tio, (de, and clamare, clamatum, 'to cry out.') The art of depicting the sentiments by inflections of the voice, accompanied by gestures, which render the meaning of the speaker more evident, and infuse into the minds of the auditors the emotions with which he is impressed. Declamation may become the cause of disease; the modification, produced in the pulmonary circulation,— accompanied by the great excitement sometimes experienced,— is the cause of many morbid affections; particularly of pneumonia, hæmoptysis, and apoplexy. In moderation, it gives a healthy excitement to the frame.

Déclin, Decline.

Declina'tio, (de, and clinare, clinatum, 'to bend.') Decline.

Decline', Declina'tio, Inclina'tio, Decremen'tum, Remis'sio, Parac'mē, Parac'masis, (F.) Déclin. That period of a disorder or paroxysm, at which the symptoms begin to abate in violence, (F.) Décours. We speak, also, of the decline of life, or of the powers, (F.) Déclin de l'age, L'age de déclin, when the physical and moral faculties lose a little of their activity and energy. See Phthisis, and Tabes.

Déclive (F.), Decli'vis, (de, and clivis, 'acclivity.') Inclining downwards. This epithet is applied to the most depending part of a tumor or abscess.

Décocté, Decoction.

Decoc'tion, Decoc'tio, (decoquere,— de, and coquere, coctum,—'to boil,') Epse'sis, Apoz'esis, Ze'sis, Hepse'sis, Aphep'sis, (F.) Décoction. The operation of boiling certain ingredients in a fluid, for the purpose of extracting the parts soluble at that temperature. Decoction, likewise, means the product of this operation, to which the terms Decoc'tum, Ze'ma, Aphepse'ma, Ap'ozem, Apoz'ema, Hepse'ma, Chy'lus, and Epse'ma, (F.) Décocté, Apozème, Hydrolé, Hydrolite, have been applied according to ancient custom, in order to avoid any confusion between the operation and its product; — as præpara'tio is used for the act of preparing; præpara'tum, for the thing prepared. The French Codex (1866) has formulæ for a variety of Apozèmes.

It is preceded by indisposition, lassitude, watchfulness, headache, and anorexia; the delirium and tremors, Tre'mor potato'rum, most commonly recurring in paroxysms. It is caused by the habitual and intemperate use of ardent spirits or of opium or tobacco; or by abandoning them after prolonged use. The treatment is various. Many have regarded stimulants, with large doses of opium to induce rest, to be indispensable. It is certain, however, that the expectant system will often, if not generally, be successful; and, it is probable, a cure effected in this manner will be more permanent than when produced by excitants.

Délivrance, (F.) An expression, which, in common language, signifies the action of delivering, libera'tio, but in the practice of obstetrics means the extrusion of the secundines, either spontaneously or by the efforts of art. This completion of delivery — par'tus secunda'rius, secundina'rum expul'sio seu extrac'tio — is produced by the same laws as the expulsion of the fœtus. Sometimes, the after-birth follows the child immediately; at others, it is retained, and requires manual interference to remove it. The following are the chief cases in which it has been practised: — 1. Intimate adhesion between the placenta and paries of the uterus. 2. Spasmodic contraction of the orifice of the uterus. 3. Hour-glass contraction. 4. Torpor or hemorrhage after the expulsion of the child; and, 5. Insertion of the placenta at the orifice of the uterus.

The systematic name of the Staves'acre, Staphisagria, Phtheiroc'tonum, Phthei'rium, Sta'phis, Pedicula'ria, (F.) Staphisaig're, Herbe aux Poux, Dauphinelle. The seeds, Staphisa'gria (Ph. L. and E.), have a disagreeable smell; a nauseous, bitterish, hot taste; and are cathartic, emetic, and vermifuge; owing, however, to the violence of their operation, they are seldom given internally, and are chiefly used in powder, mixed with hair powder, to destroy lice. An alkaloid of this plant has been separated, and received the name of Delphin'ia, Del'phia, (F.) Delphine, Delphinine. It is extremely acrid, and has been recently used, like veratria, in tic douloureux, paralysis, and rheumatism. It is used in the form of ointment, or in solution in alcohol, (gr. x. to xxx., or more, to ℥j.,) applied externally.

It extends from the outer third of the clavicle, from the acromion and spine of the scapula to near the middle and outer part of the os humeri, where it is inserted by means of a strong tendon. This muscle raises the arm directly upwards, when the shoulder is fixed, and carries it anteriorly or posteriorly, according to the direction of the fibres, which are thrown into action. If the arm be rendered immovable, the deltoid acts inversely and depresses the shoulder.

Del'toid Lig'ament. The internal lateral ligament of the ankle-joint is so called, from its shape.

Physicians, however, have applied it to those cases of unsound mind which are characterized by a total loss of the faculty of thought, or by such an imbecility of intellect that the ideas are extremely incoherent, there being at the same time a total loss of the power of reasoning. Mania and melancholy are apt to end in this, if possible, more deplorable state. Do'tage is the Dementia of the aged—Mo'ria de'mens lere'ma, Lere'ma, Lere'sis, Le'rus, Delira'tio Se'num, Amen'tia Seni'lis, Pueril'itas, Delir'ium Seni'lē, Anil'itas, Se'nile Insan'ity, Se'nile Demen'tia, Insan'ity of the a'ged, (Sc.) Doittrie,—a form of insanity, in which there is a hopeless decadency or loss of the mental faculties.

Substances of a mucilaginous or saccharine nature belong to this class. Demulcents may act directly on the parts with which they come in contact; but in other cases, as in catarrh, their effect is produced by contiguous sympathy; the top of the larynx being soothed by them first, and indirectly the inflamed portion of the air-passages. In diseases of the urinary organs, they have no advantage over simple diluents. — See Diluents and Emollients. The following are demulcents; — Acaciæ Gummi; Althææ Folia et Radix; Amygdalæ; Amylum; Avenæ Farina; Cera; Cetaceum; Cydoniæ Semina; Fucus Crispus; Glycyrrhiza; Hordeum; Lichen; Linum; Olivæ Oleum; Sassafras Medulla; Sesamum; Sevum; Tragacantha, and Ulmus.

It was extremely violent in its symptoms, but not often fatal. It usually commenced with great languor, chilliness, and pain in the tendons about the smaller joints. To these symptoms succeeded burning heat and redness of the skin, pains in the muscles of the limbs or in the forehead, with vomiting or nausea. The fever continued for one, two, or three days, and usually terminated by copious perspiration. In different places, it put on different appearances; but seems in all to have been a singular variety of rheumatic fever. The usual antiphlo-gistic treatment was adopted, and successfully. See Acrodynia.

Dentit''ion, Teeth'ing, Dentit''io, Denti'tis, Odontophy'ia, Odonti'asis, Odonto'sis, (dentire, dentitum, 'to breed teeth.') The exit of the teeth from the alveoli and gums; or rather the phenomena which characterize the different periods of their existence. The germs of the first teeth, dentes lac'tei or milk teeth, (F.) dents de lait, are visible in the fœtus about the end of the second month; and they begin to be ossified from the end of the third to that of the sixth month. At birth, the corona of the incisors is formed, but that of the canine is not completed; and the tubercles of the molares are not yet all united. Gradually, the fang becomes developed; and at about six or eight months begins what is commonly called the first dentit''ion, Odon'tia dentitio'nis lactan'tium. The two middle incisors of the lower jaw commonly appear first; and, some time afterwards, those of the upper jaw: afterwards, the two lateral incisors of the lower jaw; and then those of the upper, followed by the four anterior molares; the canine, or eye-teeth, at first, those of the lower, and, afterwards, those of the upper jaw, next appear; and, subsequently and successively, the first 4 molares — 2 above and 2 below, 1 on each side. The whole number of the primary, temporary, deciduous, shedding or milk-teeth, (dentes tempora'rii,) (F.) Dents de lait, is now 20.

The eruption of the milk teeth takes place, approximately, in the following order:

Central incisors	6th to 8th month.
Lateral incisors	7th to 10th month.
First molar	12th to 14th month.
Canines	15th to 20th month.
Second molar	20th to 30th month.

The sec'ond dentit''ion or shed'ding of the teeth, Odon'tia dentitio'nis pueri'lis, Dedentit''ion, begins about the age of 6 or 7. The germs or membranous follicles of these second teeth — to the number of 32 — as well as the rudiments of the teeth themselves, are visible, even in the fœtus, with the exception of those of the small molares, which do not appear till after birth. They are contained in alveoli of the same shape as those of the first dentition. Their ossification commences at from 3 to 6 months after birth, in the incisors and first molares; at 8 or 9 months, in the canine; about 3 years, in the molares; 3½ in the second great molares, and about 10 years in the last. As the alveolus of a new tooth becomes gradually augmented, the septum between it and that of the corresponding milk tooth is absorbed, and disappears. The root of the milk tooth is likewise absorbed; its corona becomes loose and falls out, and all the first teeth are gradually replaced by the per'manent teeth, Den'tes serot'ini. This second dentition becomes necessary in consequence of the increased size of the jaws. The new teeth have neither the same direction nor the same shape as the old; and they are more numerous, amounting, until the age of 25 (sooner or later), to 28. About this period, a small molaris appears at the extremity of each jaw, which is called wis'dom tooth, wit tooth, Dens sapien'tiæ seu serot'inus seu sophroret'icus seu sophronis'tus seu sophronis'ter seu opsi'gonus, Ops'iodous, (F.) Arrière dent, Dent de sagesse, making the whole number of permanent teeth 32.

The eruption of the permanent teeth is remarkable for its general regularity; so that it constitutes an important means for ascertaining the age of the individual during the early period of life.

First molars	7th year.
Central incisors	8th year.
Lateral incisors	9th year.
First bicuspids	10th year.
Second bicuspids	11th year.
Canines	12th year.
Second molars	13th year.

The teeth of the lower jaw generally precede by a few weeks those of the upper.

During the period of dentition, that is, of the first dentition, the infant is especially liable to disease;—the irritation, produced by the pressure of the tooth on the superincumbent gum, sometimes occasioning pyrexia, convulsions, diarrhœa, &c., which symptoms are often strikingly relieved by a free division of the distended gum. This disordered condition is called Teeth'ing, Odon'tia dentitio'nis, Odonti'asis, Odontal'gia dentitio'nis, Odaxis'mus.

Dep'ilatory or Depil'atory, Depilato'rium, Psilo'thron, Ectillot'icus, Epilato'rium, (F.) Dépilatoire, Dépilatif, Épilatoire. Anything which causes the loss of the hair. Depilatories are usually caustic applications, in which quicklime or some other alkaline substance, sulphuret of iron, &c., enter.

Dep'ilatory, Col'ley's, seems to consist of quicklime and a portion of sulphuret of potassium.

Delcroix's depilatory and Plenck's depilatory have a similar composition. They all probably contain arsenic, in the form of orpiment. The following formula has been given for that of Colley: quicklime, 30 parts, soap lees, 125 parts, sulphur, 4 parts, nitre, 4 parts, orpiment, 12 parts. Another depilatory by F. Boudet is formed of sulphuret of sodium, 3 parts, quicklime, in powder, 10, starch, 10; mix. Rub a little of this powder with water, apply it to the part, and remove the hair in a minute or two with a wooden knife. Dorvault recommends the Depilatory of Martins, which is a sulphuretted sulphuret of calcium; made by passing sulphohydric acid into quicklime to saturation. A little of this is applied to the part, and in eight or ten minutes it becomes solid. It must then be washed off with cold or hot water, when the skin will be found denuded. Another, given by Redwood, is a strong solution of the sulphuret of barium, made into a paste with starch powder. It is used like the one advised by Boudet. Those that do not contain arsenic are, of course, safer.

A pitch plas'ter, Pitch'cap, Dro'pax, is sometimes used as a depilatory. It of course pulls the hair out by the roots. Depilation by it has been termed Dropacism'us, Pisso'sis, Pitto'sis, Picacism'us, and Pica'tio.

pass,') Uri'næ profluvium, Hyperdinre'sis, Si'pho uri'næ, Urorrhag''ia, Polyu'ria, Hydrops ad Mat'ulam seu Matel'læ, Polyure'sis, Uroze'mia, Ureorrhœ'a, Dip'sacus, Diarrhœ'a in Uri'uâ seu urino'sa, (F.) Diabète, Flux d'Urine. A disease characterized by great augmentation, and often manifest alteration in the secretion of urine; with excessive thirst and progressive emaciation. Cullen has described two species: — Diabetes insip'idus and D. melli'tus; the former, (F.) Diabète faux ou insipide, Diabète, being, simply, a superabundant discharge of limpid urine, of its usual, urinary taste; the latter, D. Melli'tus, called, also, Paru'ria Melli'ta, Diabetes An'glicus seu ve'rus, Melitu'ria, Melithyperu'ria, Glucosu'ria, Glycyrrhœ'a urino'sa, Uroze'mia melli'ta, Saccharorrhœ'a urino'sa, Phthisu'ria, Urophthi'sis, Ta'bes diureti'ica seu diabe'tica, Dyspep'sia saccharig''ena, Apoceno'sis Diabe'tes Melli'tus, Sac'charine diabe'tes, (F.) Diabète sucré, Hyperurorrhée saccharine, Phthisurie sucrée, — falls under the definition given above. The quantity of urine, discharged in the 24 hours, is sometimes excessive, amounting to 30 pints and upwards; each pint containing sometimes 2½ oz. saccharine matter. This replaces the urea, which is not found in quantity in the urine of those laboring under diabetes. Where the disease is situate is not clear. The whole system of nutrition, however, seems to be morbidly implicated. A part of the urine must be formed at the expense of the system, as the egesta frequently far exceed the solid and liquid ingesta. On dissection, no morbid appearance is met with sufficient to enable us to fix on the seat of this distressing affection.

All the remedies that have been tried have usually been found insufficient in D. Mellitus. Skim milk has been prescribed under the idea that the patient would thus get both albuminous and saccharine proximate principles of food.

D. insip'idus, Hyperure'sis aquo'sa, Hydru'ria, Hydrure'sis, Paru'ria incon'tinens aquo'sa, Diabe'tes spu'rius, Urorrhœ'a, U'real Diabe'tes, (F.) Polyurie, Hyperurorrhée, Diabète insipide, Faux diabète, which occurs in hysterical habits, and has, hence, been called D. hyster'icus, is of comparatively trifling moment. Exclusive diet, and attention to the state of the cutaneous transpiration, which have sometimes produced good effects in D. Mellitus, have most commonly failed.

Many varieties have been made by some nosologists,— e. g. mucous,—Diarrhœ'a muco'sa, Blennoche'sia, Blennoche'zia, Mycodiarrhœ'a; and by some authors Enter'ia, Enteri'tis, Diarrhœ'a catarrho'sa seu catarrha'lē, and Erythemoï'des, under the idea that it is associated with an erythematous congestion of the mucous surface; bilious,—Ileocholo'sis, Cholodiarrhœ'a, Diarrhœ'a bilio'sa; serous,—Hydroche'zia, Hydrodiarrhœ'a, Orrhoche'zia; dependent upon the matters evacuated. Diarrhœ'a al'ba is a form of bowel disease sometimes epidemic in Barbadoes, the stools being white and milky. Diarrhœa requires different treatment, according to its nature. If caused, as it often is, by improper matters in the intestinal canal, these must be evacuated; and the astringent plan of treatment must not be adopted, unless the discharges seem kept up by irritability of the intestines, or unless they are colliquative. Indiscriminate use of astringents is to be deprecated.

A very fatal diarrhœa prevails among the native inhabitants of India, to which Mr. Tytler has given the name Diarrhœ'a hec'tica, because, like hectic fever, it seems to obtain habitual possession of the constitution, to operate upon it with scarcely any perceptible intermission, and in general to defy the most powerful remedies.

In antiquity, great importance was attached to the observation of days in disease. The medical day is usually reckoned at 24 hours, — universally, in estimating the duration of a disease. In parts of the United States, it comprises only the time when the sun is above the horizon, as regards the administration of medicine, so that if a medicine be ordered to be taken four times a day, it is understood to mean during the 12 hours of day.

At the present day, it usually signifies a particular kind of food and drink. Also, abstinence: — to put any one upon diet, (F.) mettre quelqu'un à la diète, means to deprive him of his usual nourishment. The terms milk diet, Diæ'ta lac'tis; flesh or meat diet, Diæ'ta car'nis; soup or broth diet, Diæ'ta ju'ris vel jus'culi, &c., explain themselves. See Aliment, Hygiene, and Regimen.

Di'etary, Victûs Ra'tio. A regulated diet or allowance of food. Every large hospital, military or civil; every prison and eleemosynary institution of every kind, has certain dietetic regulations, and many of them have Tables of Dietary or Diet Scales, which are more or less implicitly followed. See Diet.

The Diet Scale of the British Navy allowed from 31 to 35½ ounces of dry nutritious matter daily; of which 26 ounces were vegetable, and the rest animal — 9 ounces of salt meat, or 4½ ounces of fresh. That of the navy of the United States has been as follows: — Three days in the week—Pork, 16 oz.; beans or peas, 7 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.; sugar, 2 oz.; tea, ¼ oz.; — 40¼ oz. Two days in the week— Beef, 16 oz.; flour, 8 oz.; fruit, dried, 4 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; tea and sugar, 2¼ oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.; — 45¼ oz. Two days in the week — Beef, 16 oz.; rice, 8 oz.; butter, 2 oz.; cheese, 2 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; tea and sugar, 2¼ oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.; — 45¼ oz. The daily Diet allowance to the British soldier has been one pound of bread and three-quarters of a pound of meat. In the Army of the United States, the quantity of beef, salt or fresh, issued per day, is a pound and a quarter; of pork or of bacon, three-quarters of a pound. Ordinarily, the soldiers have fresh meat four days in the week, and salt meat the other three days; but every diet scale is subject to mutations in the individual articles. It must combine, however, a due admixture of nitrogenized, non-nitrogenized, and inorganic materials. See Aliment. (The work of Dr. Pereira on 'Food and Diet,' and the Treatise on Hygiene by Dr. W. A. Hammond, of the United States Army, 1863, contain numerous Dietaries, civil and military.) See, also, Ration.

Dietetics is diet administered according to principle. It is an important part of Hygiene. A well-regulated system of diet has great power in checking disease, and likewise in preventing it. Dietetics has been used, also, synonymously with Hygiene.

It is attached to the mastoid groove of the temporal bone, and to a fossette at the side of the symphysis menti. Its tendon passes through an aponeurotic ring, which is attached to the os hyoides.

The use of the digastricus is to depress the lower jaw, or to raise the os hyoides, and to carry it forward or backward, as in deglutition.

Cibo'rum, Pep'sis, Diges'tive Proc''ess.* Digestion is a function, by means of which alimentary substances, when introduced into the digestive canal, undergo different alterations. The object of it is to convert them into two parts; the one, a reparatory juice, destined to renew the perpetual waste occurring in the economy: the other, deprived of its nutritious properties, to be rejected from the body. This function is composed of a series of organic actions, differing according to the particular organization of the animal. In man they are eight in number, viz.: 1. Prehension of food. 2. Mastication. 3. Insalivation. 4. Deglutition. 5. Action of the stomach. 6. Action of the small intestine. 7. Action of the large intestine. 8. Expulsion of the fæces.

Diges'tion, Artific''ial. That which is effected outside the stomach by admixture of materials like those of the gastric juice; or by the gastric juice itself.

Diges'tion is also a pharmaceutical operation, which consists in treating certain solid substances with water, alcohol, or other menstruum, at a slightly elevated temperature, — in a sand-bath, for example, or by leaving them exposed for some time to the sun.

In over-doses, Digitalis causes vomiting, purging, dimness of sight, vertigo, delirium, hiccough, convulsions, and death: — all the symptoms, in short, which characterize the acro-narcotic class of poisons. Its active principle has been called Dig''italine or Dig''italin, Digita'lia, Digita'lium, Digitali'num, (Ph. B., 1867; Ph. U. S., 1873.) The latter contains a necessarily elaborate formula for its preparation, the ingredients of which are digitalis, stronger alcohol, acetic acid, purified animal charcoal, tannic acid, oxide of lead, stronger ether, water of ammonia, diluted alcohol, and distilled water. The dose, to commence with, is gr. 1-60 or gr. 1-50. — Several other principles have also been obtained from digitalis, as digitalire'tin, dig''italose, &c.

All aqueous drinks are diluents. They are administered, with great advantage, in various diseases. In fever, water, which is the most familiar diluent, may be freely allowed; the only precaution being to give it hot in the cold stage, cold in the hot, and tepid in the sweating. In diseases where it is considered necessary to abstract blood largely, diluents should not be given too freely. The abstraction of blood occasions activity of absorption, and the mass is speedily restored. It is also obvious, that in cases of inflammation of the mammæ, in nurses, diluents should not be freely allowed, as they increase the secretion of milk, and add to the irritation. When demulcents are exhibited in cases of urinary disease, they act simply as diluents; their mucilaginous portion is digested in the stomach and small intestine, — the watery portion alone being separated by the kidney.

Dilute', Dilu'ted, Dilu'tus, (F.) Délayé, Étendu. In Pharmacy, these terms are generally used synonymously. By some, however, a 'dilute acid,' for example, means a weak acid; while a 'diluted acid' is one that has been rendered weaker by the addition of water.

Dilu'tion, with the homœopathist, is the action by which the dose of a medicine is diminished, as, by dissolving a grain of any medicinal artiele in a certain quantity of a liquid; then taking a grain of the solution and adding it to a like quantity of the liquid: and this may be repeated until the 'thirtieth dilution.'

Disinfec'tion, Disinfec'tio, (F.) Désinfection. The act of attempting to destroy miasmata, with which the air, the clothing, &c., may be infected. Various means have been proposed for this purpose. Those most commonly employed are: chlorine, sulphurous and chlorohydric acid gases, vapors of vinegar, nitrous acid, carbolic acid, and what is, perhaps, the most manageable of any, chlorinated lime, or any of the chlorides of the alkalies. It is more than questionable whether any chemical action occurs between these agents and the miasmata, whence results a compound which is harmless, or in other words, whether there is any agent that is capable of destroying morbific miasms. Disinfection also includes the action of antiseptics.

The following fumigations have been largely employed as disinfectants:

Chlo'rine or Oxymuriat'ic Fumiga'tion, Solu'tio alexite'ria Gaubia'na, Fumiga'tio antiloim'ica Gau'bii, Alexite'rium chlo'ricum, Fumiga'tio Guytonien'sis, is made by adding common salt, ℥ij., to black oxide of manganese, ℥j., sulphuric acid, ℥j., and water, f℥ij. A Dispensatory differs from a Pharmacopœia, in containing the physical and medical history of the various substances; while the Pharmacopœia is mainly restricted to the mode of preparing them. The Pharmacopœia too, is published under the authority of, and by the members of a college or association; while a Dispensatory contains the whole of the Pharmacopœia or Pharmacopœias, with additions by the author, under whose authority alone it usually appears. The Pharmacopœia, in other words, is officinal; the Dispensatory, generally, private. Formerly, the words were used indiscriminately. See Formulary, and Pharmacopœia.

Distil'late, see Distillation.

Distilla'tion, Destilla'tio, Stalag'mus, (destillare,—de, and stillare, — 'to drop, little by little,') Catastalag'mus. An operation, by which — by the aid of heat and in closed vessels—the volatile are separated from the fixed parts of bodies, with the view of collecting the former, when condensed in appropriate receivers. The product of distillation is the distill'ate, (G.) Destillat.

The ancients distinguished distillation per la'tus, per asceu'sum, and per desceu'sum, according to the direction which the volatilized matters were made to take. In distillation per latus, the apparatus is so arranged that the vapor passes horizontally through a succession of spaces before reaching the receiver. Distillation per ascensum is the ordinary method by the still. In distillation per desceusum, the fire is applied above and around the top of the apparatus; and it is so arranged that the vapor must pass downwards.

Frac'tional distilla'tion is when ingredients volatilized at different degrees of heat are separated from each other during the process. When dry organic matter is placed in an apparatus for distillation, and heat is applied until all volatile matter is driven out, the process is called dry or destructive distillation.

It is one of the most common varieties of worms, infesting the livers of the sheep, goat, ox, stag, fallow-deer, horse, ass, hog, hare, &c., and is the cause of the Rot in sheep and cattle. The treatment is like that required for other worms.

It is of a fawn color, from 3 to 5 lines in length, with an oval head, flattened and terminating in a point posteriorly; contained in a membranous sac, and furnished, anteriorly, with a bifurcated, rugous horn. Laënnec considers it a vesicular worm or hydatid. According to Von Siebold, there is no such entozoon. The undigested seed of the mulberry, which had been eaten, was mistaken for it. See Parasites.

To this class belong squill, juniper, digitalis, &c. In testing the lungs with water, for the purpose of seeing whether they are specifically heavier or lighter than that fluid. This is called Docimasia Pulmo'num hydrostat'ica, or the Hydrostat'ic Test. If lighter, it would be some evidence that the fœtus had respired: 2. In comparing the weight of the lungs with that of the whole body; the weight of lungs in which respiration has taken place being nearly twice as great. This is Docimasia Pulmo'num Stat'ica, or Plouequet's Stat'ic Test, but, according to Casper, is unworthy of attention; and, 3. By measuring the circumference of the thorax and lungs; and comparing their dimensions with those of an infant which has not respired. This is Dan'iel's Test. These tests, singly, afford only probable evidence: but when united, the deductions may be more conclusive.

The union of the two modes of investigation makes the rational physician. These sectarians are likewise called Dog'matists, and their doctrine Dog'matism. The founders of the sect were Hippocrates, Thessalus, Draco, and Polybius; and the most celebrated of its supporters were Diocles of Carysta, Praxagoras of Cos, Chrysippus of Soli, Herophilus, and Erasistratus.

Dos, Dorsum.

Dosage, (from dose,) Posology.

Dose, Do'sis, (δοσις, from διδωμι, 'I give,') Præ'bium, (F.) Prise. The quantity of any substance, which ought to form part of a compound medicine, or ought to be exhibited singly, to produce a desired effect. Many circumstances influence the doses of medicine. Women require smaller doses, as a general principle, than men. Habit has a great effect, as well as climate, age, and idiosyncrasy: all these, and other circumstances, must be taken into account; and every general rule on the subject will be found to have numerous exceptions. Some of the mechanical physicians laid it down as a rule, that the doses of medicines must always be as the square of the constitution! — a matter not easy of calculation.

The following Tables will exhibit an approximation, but only an approximation, to the proper doses (according to age) of most substances.

Table of Doses according to Age.

Age 24	Let the full dose be	1	1 drachm.
18	will require.....	2-3ds.	2 scruples.
14	.....	half.	½ drachm.
7	.....	1-3d.	1 scruple.
4	.....	1-4th.	15 grains.
3	.....	1-6th.	10 grains.
2	.....	1-8th.	8 grains.
1	.....	1-12th.	5 grains.

The table of doses, according to age, recommended by Dr. Thomas Young, differs in some respects from the above. It, also, affords a general approximation. His rule is, that

For children, under twelve years of age, the doses of most medicines must be diminished in the proportion of the age to the age increased by twelve:

Thus, at two years, to 1-7th; i. e. $1\text{-}7\text{th} = \frac{2}{2+12}$

At twenty-one the full dose is given.

To dose, (F.) dóser, is to give medicine; and also to drug, or give to excess.

Do'ses, Bro'ken, (F.) Doses réfractées. When an agent is given in small portions it is said to be in broken doses, — refrac'tis do'sibus, (F.) à Doses refractées.

The douches descendantes are those in which the fluid falls from a height,—the douches ascendantes, those administered in diseases of the uterus,—the douches horizontales, where the fluid is impelled horizontally, &c. They may be cold or warm, according to circumstances. The apparatus consists of a reservoir of water having a pipe or plug, by means of which the water can be directed as the practitioner may desire. The Douche communicates a considerable and peculiar shock to the nervous system; and is one of the most successful means for taming the furious maniac. It is, also, useful in chronic rheumatism, stiff joints, &c. Nasal douches are applications of this form of treatment to the nasal passages.

Douches of air are occasionally used, as in cases of obstruction of the Eustachian tube by mucus. They are sent from an air-press — of which Deleau and Kramer have invented one each—through a catheter introduced through the nose into the tube.

Ord.* Aroideæ or Araceæ. Sex. Syst., Tetrandria Monogynia. This indigenous plant, as some of its names import, is extremely fetid. The property on which its medical virtues are dependent, resides in a volatile principle, which is impaired by long keeping, especially in powder. Dose of the dried root, Dracon'tium (Ph. U. S.), ten to twenty grains. It resembles asafœtida and other fetid gums in its properties; in other words, belongs to the class of reputed antispasmodics.

Cutané, Veine* ou Filaire de Médine, Fertit of the Ethiopians, Narn, Neeria, Neruah, and Narambu of the Hindoos, Rishteh or Reshther in Bokhara. A genus of worms, frequently met with in Indian and African climes. They are characterized by a filiform body, and are smooth and nearly of equal thickness throughout. The Guinea worm, when small, insinuates itself through the cutaneous pores, and penetrates into the areolar membrane and between the muscles, especially between those of the lower limbs, where it occasions a tumor like a boil, — Guinea Worm Disease,—which subsequently suppurates, and the head of the worm appears and emerges gradually. The head must then be seized, and the worm be cautiously rolled round a small cylinder of linen or other substance. Care must be taken not to break it, as great pain and obstinate suppuration might be the consequence.

Considerable obscurity rests on this subject. Some even deny that the cases of Dracunculus, on record, are really those of worms.

The morbid phenomena induced by the dracunculus have been termed Draconti'asis, (F.) Dracontiase. See Parasites.

Drain'ing, (Sax. þrehnigean, or from (F.) trainer, 'to draw,') Dessica'tio, (F.) Dessèchement. The act of drawing off the water from marshes, for the purpose of destroying the unhealthy emanations which proceed from them. It is a well known fact, that from marshes arise certain emanations or miasmata, with the nature of which we are, however, totally unacquainted, but which are the fertile source of intermittents and other diseases. Draining the soil and converting it into arable land changes its character, and the malaria ceases to be given off. It has happened, however, that although in some such situations intermittents have been got rid of, consumptions have taken their place.

Dynam'ic, Dynam'ical, Dynam'icus, (F.) Dynamique, (from dynamis.) In Mechanics, Dynam'ics investigates the powers whereby bodies are put in motion, and the laws connected therewith; in Biology, that which relates to the vital forces, to the organism in action, Vi'tal Dynamics. The influences of agents on the organism, which are ascribable to neither mechanical nor chemical causes, are sometimes termed dynam'ic. In this sense, it is a favorite term with the homœopathists, who maintain that, by certain processes, called, in the aggregate, dynamiza'tion and potenti'zing, the dynamic powers of a medicine may be set free and developed — as by shaking the bottle in which the article is contained, or by mixing an unlimited number of unmedicated globules with one that is medicated, and shaking them together. In this way, the former become po'tentized.

Dynamom'eter, Dynamiom'eter, Myodynamiom'eter, Myodynamom'eter, (F.) Dynamomètre, (dynamis, and μετρον, 'measure.') An instrument, contrived by M. Regnier for measuring the comparative muscular strength of man and animals. It consists of a spring, which, when pressed upon, causes a needle to move upon a portion of a circle, furnished with a scale of kilogrammes and one of myriagrammes. To measure the strength of the hands, the two branches of the spring are firmly grasped, and brought as near together as the force can carry them. This effort makes the needle traverse, and indicates, on the scale of kilogrammes, the strength of the experimenter's hands. A man, 25 or 30 years of age, exerts a force commonly equal to 50 kilogrammes or 100 pounds.

The strength of the loins of a man, about 30 years of age, as indicated by this instrument, is usually about 30 myriagrammes, or 265 pounds, which shows the weight he is capable of raising.

From experiments made by Péron, in his voyage, on 12 individuals of Van Diemen's Land, 17 of New Holland, 56 of the Island of Timor, 17 Frenchmen belonging to the expedition, and 14 Englishmen in the colony of New South Wales, he found their comparative strength, indicated by the dynamometer, to be as follows:

Natives of	Strength. Of the arm.		Of the loins.
	Kilog.	lbs.	Myri.	lbs.
1. Van Diemen's Land	50.6	101.2
2. New Holland	50.8	101.6	10.2	208.08
3. Timor	58.7	117.4	11.6	238.64
4. France	69.2	138.4	15.2	310.08
5. England	71.4	142.4	15.2	332.52

Dynamom'eter or Dynam'eter, Medic'inal. Inflammation of the mucous membrane of the large intestine; the chief symptoms of which are: — fever, more or less inflammatory, with frequent mucous or bloody evacuations; violent tormina and tenesmus. When the evacuations do not contain blood, it has been called Dysenter'ia al'ba or sim'ple Dys'entery, Mycodysenter'ia. The seat of the disease is, generally, in the colon and rectum. It occurs, particularly, during the summer and autumnal months, and in hot climates more than in cold: frequently, also, in camps and prisons, in consequence of impure air and imperfect nourishment: and is often epidemic. Sporadic cases of dysentery are, generally, easily managed; but when the disease occurs epidemically, it often exhibits great malignancy.

Generally, it yields to mild laxatives, as castor oil, combined with diaphoretic narcotics, such as the pulvis ipecacuanhæ compositus, and counter-irritants to the abdomen; but, at times, the inflammation runs on so speedily to ulceration, that, unless a new action be rapidly excited, death will be the consequence. In such cases, mercury must be rapidly introduced into the system, and narcotics may be combined with it.

The whole management in acute dysentery must, of course, be strictly antiphlogistic.

An epidemic dysentery prevailed in the 10th century, under the name Scitta.

Dysmenorrhœa is very difficult of removal, and prevents conception. In the married female, if she should be able to pass one period without pain, and subsequently become pregnant, the morbid action may be broken in upon by gestation, and a perfect cure be obtained. Change of air, soon after marriage, will sometimes give occasion to this desirable result. The affection generally depends upon erethism of the interior of the uterus, called into action at each catamenial period. It may also be of ovarian origin (see Dysootocia) or dependent upon obstruction of the Fallopian tube, — tu'bal dysmenorrhœa. The violence of the pain requires the liberal use of narcotics.

A state of the stomach, in which its functions are disturbed, without the presence of other diseases, or when, if other diseases be present, they are of but minor importance. The numerous forms of disorder of the digestive organs have occasionally been termed 'the indigestions.' The symptoms of dyspepsia are very various. Those affecting the stomach itself are — loss of appetite; nausea; pain in the epigastrium or hypochondrium; heartburn; sense of fulness, or weight in the stomach; acrid or fetid eructations; pyrosis, and sense of fluttering or sinking at the pit of the stomach. The sympathetic affections are of the most diversified character. Dyspepsia, being generally of a functional nature, is devoid of danger. When arising from disease of the stomach itself, it is, of course, more serious. Dyspepsia may be of duodenal origin, duode'nal or intes'tinal dyspepsia, and is generally accompanied with pain over that bowel some hours after food has been taken.

It is usually dependent on irregularity of living, either in the quantity or quality of the food taken: and the most successful treatment is, to put the patient on a diet easy of digestion; to combat the causes, where such are apparent; and, by proper remedies and regimen, to strengthen the system in every practicable manner. A great error exists in regarding it as always a disease of debility. It is often connected with an inflammatory or subinflammatory condition of the mucous lining of the stomach, and of course a very different plan of treatment is required in the two cases. Dyspepsia is often attended with too great a secretion of the gastric acids; but, on other occasions, they would appear to be too small in quantity, so as to constitute al'kaline or neu'tral indiges'tion.

Ear, (Sax. eare,) Au'ris, Ous, Ac'oë, (Prov.) Lug, (F.) Oreille. The organ of audition. It is composed of a series of more or less irregular cavities, in which the sonorous rays are successively received and reflected, until they agitate the nerves which are destined to convey the impression to the brain. The ear is contained partly in the substance of the temporal bone; and a part projects externally, behind the joint of the lower jaw. It may be divided into three portions; — the outer or exter'nal ear, formed by the auricle and meatus auditorius; the middle ear, comprising the cavity of the tympanum and its dependencies; and the inter'nal ear, comprehending the three semicircular canals, the cochlea and the vestibule; which, together, constitute the osseous labyrinth. Within the cavity of this labyrinth are contained membranes having nearly the shape of the vestibule and semicircular canals, but not extending into the cochlea. These membranes form the mem'branous lab'yrinth. Between the osseous and the membranous labyrinth is situate the liquor of Cotunnius, and within the membranous labyrinth is a fluid, termed, by De Blainville, vitrine auditive, from its supposed analogy to the vitreous humor of the eye. The form of the membranous vestibule is not an exact imitation of the osseous cavity, being composed of two distinct sacs, which open into each other, — the one termed the Sac'culus vestib'uli; the other, Sac'culus. Each sac contains in its interior a small mass of white calcareous matter resembling powdered chalk, which seems to be suspended in the fluid of the sacs by means of a number of nervous filaments proceeding from the auditory nerve. These are the otoconies and otolithes of Breschet.

The auditory nerve is distributed to the cavities of the internal ear.

The scalp gives evidence of inflammatory excitement, and the lymphatic ganglions of the neck are apt to become inflamed and suppurate.

Electric''itas, Electricity — e. Animalis, Galvanism — e. Galvanica, Galvanism — e. Metallica, Galvanism.

Electric''ity, Electric''itas, (from ηλεκτρον, 'amber,'—the substance in which it was first noticed.) Electricity is used medicinally as an excitant. It has been occasionally employed with success in paralysis, rheumatism, accidental deafness, amaurosis, amenorrhœa, &c., but is not extensively used; and the cases are not always clear in which it could be of service. It may be communicated by means of the electric bath, — Bain électrique, as it has been called, — which consists in placing the patient upon an insulated stool, and connecting him with the prime conductor, of which he thus becomes a part. The fluid may be communicated by points, sparks, or by shocks, according to the required intensity. See Electrization.

Electric''ity, Chem'ical, Galvanism — e. Contact, Galvanism — e. Magnetic, Electromagnetism — e. Voltaic, Galvanism.

Elec'trify, Elec'trize, (electrical, and fio, 'I become,') (F.) Électriser. To produce the electrical condition in a body, or to render it susceptible of producing electrical phenomena. It is often used to signify the act of communicating the electric fluid to man.

Électriser, Electrify.

Electriza'tion, Electriza'tio, (F.) Électrisation. The medical application of electricity.

Lo'calized electriza'tion, (F.) Electrisation localizée, of Duchenne, of Boulogne, consists in concentrating the electric action in particular parts without electro-puncture or any surgical operation.

It is founded on the greater or less resistance presented by a tissue to electric currents, according to its state of dryness or of moisture; and may be practised by using wet sponges or a metallic knob covered with a piece of wet kid for deep-seated structures, as muscles or any internal viscus; and dry metallic bodies of varying shape, or a metallic brush, for the purpose of cutaneous electrization. Electrization may also be employed for diagnostic purposes; for example, the atrophied muscle of rheumatism contracts well under the galvanic stimulus, while the opposite is the case in fatty transformation of the muscular tissue. See Galvanization, localized.

Electrolyt'ic, Electrolyt'icus, (F.) Electrolytique, (electro, and λυειν, 'to dissolve,' 'to decompose.') Relating or appertaining, according to M. Bernard, to electrolysis or chemical decomposition induced by electricity; as 'electrolytic treatment' of tumors or the modified nutrition induced in them by electricity, which may cause their absorption.

Electromag'netism. An electro-magnetic apparatus is occasionally used in cases of paralysis, or when a powerful excitant has to be applied to a part of the organism. A convenient form consists of a battery of six curved permanent magnets, and an intensity armature, around whose cylinders 1500 yards of fine insulated copper wire are coiled. The ends of the wire communicate respectively with a pair of directors, each of which holds a piece of sponge, dipped in vinegar or a solution of common salt. When the armature is rotated, and a portion of the body is interposed between the directors, a succession of shocks is received.

Electropunc'ture, Electropunctura'tion, Electropunctu'ra, Electrostix'is, and Galvanopunc'ture, Galvanopunctu'ra. The operation of inserting two or more wires, and then connecting them to the electrodes of the electric or galvanic apparatus. It has been employed therapeutically in cases in which electricity, galvanism, and acupuncturation have been indicated.

Electrostix'is, (electro, and στιξις, 'puncturation,') Electropuncture.

Electrother'apy, Electrotherapi'a, (electro, and therapeia.) Treatment of disease by electricity.

El'ement, Elemen'tum, (akin to ancient eleo, for oleo, 'I grow' [?],) Princip'ium, P. Primiti'vum, Stoichei'on. A simple, ultimate constituent or principle in the human body, which forms the basis of a fibre or tissue. Also, a constituent of a compound organ. The inorgan'ic elements are simple principles. An organ'ic element, proximate principle or compound of organization, results from the union of certain inorganic elements. Oxygen, hydrogen, carbon, and nitrogen, are inorganic elements; fibrin, albumen, casein, &c., organic elements.

The elements of the human body are the following: Simple bodies, oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, carbon; sulphur, phosphorus, fluorine, chlorine, sodium, potassium, calcium, magnesium, silicium, iron. Inorganic combinations, water, carbonic acid (in combination with lime, potassa, and other bases); ammonia; cyanogen (in combination); sulphuric acid (in combination): sulphuretted hydrogen; phosphoric acid (in combination); different chlorides; combinations of oxygen with sodium, potassium, calcium, magnesium, silicium, and iron. Organic non-nitrogeuized combinations, grape sugar, milk sugar, &c., glycogen; fats and fat acids; butyric, lactic, and formic acids. Organic nitrogeuized combinations, albumen, fibrin, casein, gelatin, mucin urea, uric acid, glycocholic and taurocholic acids (acid of bile): hippuric acid, leucin, tyrosin, creatin and creatinin, inosic acid. — Different coloring matters or ferments, as diastase, &c.

Elephanti'asis, (ελεφαντιασις,) Elephanti'a, Elephantias'mus, El'ephas, Laz'ari mor'bus seu mal'um, Pachyder'mia, Phœnic''eus mor'bus, Phymato'sis Elephanti'asis, El'ephant-skin disease', (ελεφας, gen. ελεφαντος, 'an elephant.') Various affections have been described under this name, by adding an epithet. It is ordinarily and generally applied to a condition, in which the skin is thick, livid, rugous, tuberculate, and insensible to feeling.

Elephanti'asis Anæsthe'tica, Le'pra Anæsthetica, Anæsthet'ic Lep'rosy. A form of elephantiasis, which has insensibility and atrophy as its distinguishing features.

Elephanti'asis of the Antilles, Barba'does Leg, Gland'ular disease' of Barba'does, Crus Barba'dicum, (F.) Jambes de Barbade, is the Elephantiasis of many writers, Bucne'mia, Bouchemia. It is characterized by the leg being enormously tumid and misshapen; skin thickened, livid, and rugous, often scaly; scrotum, arms, or other parts sometimes participating in the affection. The Bucne'mia or Bouchemia Trop'ica, Spargosis, Cochin leg, is an affection of this kind.

Elephanti'asis Arab'ica, E. A'rabum, Tyri'asis, El'ephas, Elephanti'asis, E. Ind'ica, Elephanti'a Ar'abum, Le'pra Ar'abum (of some), Maladie glandulaire, Ladrerie, Yava Skin of the Polynesians [?]. In this the tubercles are chiefly on the face and joints. There is loss of hair, except on the scalp; voice, hoarse and nasal; and the discase is said to be contagious and hereditary. It most frequently attacks the feet; and gives the lower extremity a fancied resemblance to the leg of an elephant, whence its name. The seat of the disease seems to be in the lymphatic vessels and glands, and in the subcutaneous areolar tissue: the inflammatory condition of which is accompanied with general morbid symptoms. Medicine has little or no effect on this loathsome complaint. See Lepra.

Elephanti'asis of Cayenne', Mal rouge de Cayenne, seems to be a variety of Lepra, characterized by red and yellow spots, occupying the forehead, ears, hands, loins, &c., afterwards extending and becoming scaly, with deformity of the parts where they are seated, particularly of the face; and ultimately producing cracks, ulcers, caries, and sometimes death.

Elephanti'asis of the Greeks, E. Græco'rum, Spedalskhed of Norway, True Leprosy, Leprœ Veræ, (F.) Lèpre Vraie, Eléphantiasis des Grecs, is probably the same disease as Lepra. See Lepra.

Elephanti'asis of In'dia is characterized by red, livid, or yellowish spots, slightly prominent, to which succeed indolent tumors, formed in the areolar texture. At a more advanced period, the phalanges swell, and become ulcerated; the bones of the nose carious, the lips thickened; and emaciation gradually carries off the patient. For this form [?] the term Spiloplaxie was proposed by Duchaffaing. It, likewise, belongs to lepra.

Elephanti'asis Ital'ica, Pellagra.

Elephanti'asis of Ja'va is likewise a variety of lepra, characterized by large white tumors on the toes and fingers, resembling scrofulous tumefactions. These tumors ulcerate, and the ulcerations spread from the extremities towards the trunk, destroying even the bones. Amputation can alone arrest its progress. The disease is often accompanied by alopecia, and by an eruption of red spots.

Elephan'tinum Emplas'trum, (Ελεφαντινον.) An ancient plaster, composed of 30 parts of ceruse, 45 of wax, oil, ℔ss., water, ℔j. Oribasius and Celsus both mention a plaster of this name, but they are by no means similar in composition.

See Lever.

Eleva'tor A'ni, Levator ani.

El'evator, Com'mon. This is a mere lever, the end of which is somewhat bent and made rough, in order that it may less readily slip away from the portion of bone which is to be raised. The instrument is used, by forming a fulcrum for it, either on the hand which holds it, or upon the fingers of the other hand; or by making a fixed point for it on the edge of the opening made with the trephine.

Eleva'tor La'bii Inferio'ris, Levator labii inferioris — e. Labii superioris proprius, Levator labii superioris proprius—e. Labiorum communis, Levator anguli oris.

El'evator of Louis differed from the common elevator in the fact of the screw-peg being united to the bridge by a kind of pivot instead of hinge, so that greater extent of motion was permitted.

Eleva'tor Oculi, Rectus superior oculi — e. Patientiæ, Levator scapulæ.

El'evator of Petit' consists of a lever mounted on a handle, and straight throughout its whole length, except at its very end, which is slightly curved, in order that it may be more conveniently put under the portion of bone intended to be elevated. The lever is pierced at various distances from its butt-end with several holes, intended for the reception of a movable screw-peg, fixed on the top of a kind of bridge. This part of the instrument consists of an arch, the ends of which are long, and covered with small pads, and on its centre is the screw-peg already mentioned. By means of these holes the arm of the lever can be lengthened at pleasure.

Eleva'tor Scap'ulæ, Levator scapulæ — e. Testiculi, Cremaster.

El'evator, Trip'loid, Vec'tis triploï'des. This was so called from its consisting of three branches, uniting above in one common trunk. The latter part was traversed by a long screw, having below a kind of hook, and above a handle for turning it. By turning the screw, the hook was drawn up, and the bone thus elevated.

The simple lever is the only one now used, owing to the want of facility and advantages in the use of the others.

Elix'ir, (Arab.) Isir, Ix'ir, Quel'les, Alex'ir. (The etymology of this word is not clear. Lemery derives it from ελκω, 'I extract;' and also from αλεξω, 'I aid.' Others believe it to be from Arabic, al-ecsir, or al-eksir, 'chymistry.') An elixir is a medicine composed of various substances held in solution in alcohol. None of these preparations are officinal. Many apothecaries have their own formulæ for them, the proportion of the ingredients, &c., varying, according to the taste of the compounder. The name has been used, however, for preparations which contain no spirit of wine.

Injuries of the larynx, trachea, or lungs; fractures of the ribs, or wounds penetrating the chest, are the most frequent causes of this affection, which is owing to the air escaping from the air-passages, and insinuating itself into the areolar texture surrounding the wound. There are some cases of emphysema, which are owing to internal causes; and hence a division has been made into the accidental and symptomatic, and the spontaneous and idiopathic.

Laënnec has described another species of emphysema of the lungs, Vesic'ular emphysema, Aéropneumonasie, Aéropneumonectasie of Piorry, consisting in excessive dilatation of the air-cells, some of which become as large as hemp-seed, ultimately break, and give rise to irregular vesicles at the surface of the lung, some of which are as large as a hazelnut. Physical signs.—The thorax externally, generally or locally, appears unnaturally convex and prominent. The intercostal spaces are widened, but depressed. The inspiratory efforts are increased. The sound on percussion is morbidly clear, but not tympanitic. On auscultation, the inspiratory murmur is feeble or suppressed. The expiration, which is more frequently audible, is prolonged, laborious, and wheezing. There are no certain physical signs which can distinguish interlobular emphysema from the vesicular.

Emphysema under the pleura pulmonalis is termed, by Piorry, Aérethmopneumonie.

A sect of physicians, who rejected all theory, and took for their guide experience alone. It was opposed to the dogmatic sect. The Empiric sect prevailed till near the time of Galen. Among its most eminent members, after Philinus and Serapion, were Apollonius, Glaucias, Bacchius of Tanagra, and Zeuxis, both disciples of Herophilus, — Heraclides of Tarentum, Cleophantus (master of Asclepiades), Menodotus of Nicomedia, and Theudas of Laodicea. They occupied themselves, chiefly, with discovering the properties of drugs, and did important service, in this manner, to medicine.

At the present day the word Empiric is only taken in a bad sense, being employed in nearly the same signification as charlatan or quack.

Emplas'trum, (εμπλαστρον, same etymon as Emplasticus,) (F.) Emplâtre, Stéaraté. A solid and tenacious compound, adhesive at the ordinary heat of the human body. Some of the plasters owe their consistence to wax and resin; and others to the chemical union which takes place between the semivitreous oxide of lead and oil. Most of them become too consistent by age. When such is the case, they may be re-melted by a gentle heat, and oil be added to them.

Melt the plaster and lard together, and as the mixture becomes thick, on cooling, sprinkle in the flies, and mix. Ph. L.) This is the common blistering plaster. Too much heat must not be used in its preparation. It requires to remain on six or eight hours before its full effect is induced, and it acts sufficiently well, provided even a piece of thin gauze or tissue paper be placed between it and the skin, whilst absorption of the flies is thus prevented. See Blister. The Blistering Cerate of the Ph. U. S., Cera'tum Canthar'idis, Canthar'ides Ce'rate, is made as follows: Cantharid. in pulv. subtiliss., ℥xij., Ceræ flavæ, Resinæ, āā ℥vij., Adipis, ℥x. The burnt smell and acrid taste which volatile products—gaseous and liquid — contract, when animal or vegetable substances are decomposed by a strong heat. The cause of this smell is seated in an oil, called empyreumat'ic, which does not exist in the substance subjected to the operation, but is the result of its decomposition. If the empyreuma occurs when the organic substance is placed in a still with a liquid, it is owing to the solid matter touching the bottom of the vessel to which the fire is applied.

The fibres of the enamel are perpendicular to the surface of the teeth, on the ivory of which they seem planted, as it were. This gives them a velvety appearance, when examined by the microscope. The enamel has no bloodvessels, and is not renewed when removed. It is formed of phosphate of lime, and a very small portion of animal matter. A delicate membrane covers the enamel — Cutic'ula, Cu'ticle of the enamel, Na'smyth's membrane, Persist'ent cap'sule of Nasmyth — but so closely united with it that it can be demonstrated only by the use of chlorohydric acid. In the latter, it is owing to some considerable loss of substance in the parietes of the cranium, produced by fractures, wounds with a cutting instrument, caries, the application of the trephine, &c. Thus, ague is endemic in marshy countries; goître at the base of lofty mountains, &c. Some authors use the term in the same sense as epidemic. We have no accurate knowledge of the emanations or other circumstances which give occasion to endemic affections. We seem to know that some emanation from marshy lands does produce intermittents: but we are ignorant of the nature of such emanation.

In this disease, the heart's action is visibly increased, and very manifest to the touch; the hand is strongly repelled, and, at moments, is sensible of a trembling vibratory motion. Percussion gives a dull sound over a surface of several inches, owing, according to Bouillaud, to the inflammatory turgescence of the heart, and the engorged state of its cavities. On auscultation, a bruit de soufflet is generally heard, masking one or both sounds of the heart; and the ear is sensible of a metallic ringing with each systole of the ventricle. The pulsations are rapid as well as strong, and, with few exceptions, irregular, unequal, and intermittent. The pulse, by the way, does not always indicate the force or number of the heart's contractions.

A term first used by Dutrochet, to express the action by which fluids pass from without to within organic membranes. The action of two fluids on each other, when separated by a membrane. The general conditions of the phenomena are — first, that they should have an affinity for the interposed membrane; and secondly, that they should have an affinity for each other, and be miscible.

At times, endosmose is used to signify the passage of the more transmissible fluid, while exosmose signifies that of the least transmissible.

The rapidity with which endosmose is accomplished varies according to the nature of the septum or tissue and of the penetrating body, and to the penetrability of the tissue.

Inflammation des Intestins.* The essential symptoms of this disease are — violent abdominal pain, increased on pressure, with vomiting and inflammatory fever. Enteritis may affect both the peritoneal and the mucous coat of the intestines; and, in violent cases, all the coats may be implicated. The structure of the mucous and peritoneal coats is different; so are their functions in health and in disease. The inflammation of the serous coat, Seroënteri'tis, Exoenteri'tis, resembles that of the cellular membrane; the inflammation of the mucous coat, that of the skin. The former is usually, therefore, of a more active character. Inflammation of the mucous coat, Esoënteri'tis, Endoënteri'tis, Mucoënteri'tis, Mu'cous Enteri'tis, Phlegmymeni'tis enter'ica, is generally attended with diarrhœa, and its pathology is identical with that of dysentery. Inflammation of the peritoneal coat is, on the other hand, generally attended with constipation.

Enteritis of the peritoneal coat, for such usually is the meaning of the word in the abstract, requires the most active treatment. Copious bleeding, followed up by a large dose of opium — and, if the symptoms be not decidedly ameliorated, repeating the bleeding and opium — warm fomentations, and blisters, are the chief agents to be relied upon. Purgatives ought not to be exhibited until the inflammation and spasm are abated by the use of the bleeding and opium. When the physician is called early, this plan will usually succeed. Sometimes, Enteritis passes into a chronic state, requiring much careful management. Broussais considered inflammation of the mucous coat of the stomach and intestines as the proximate cause of the phenomena of fevers.

It differs from endem'ic, the latter being owing to locality; but it is obvious, that should a particular epidemic constitution of the air — epidemic''ity, (F.) épidémicité— exist along with a favoring endemic condition, these combined influences may act in the causation of several of those serious and fatal complaints, which at times visit a district, and are never afterwards met with, or at least not until after the lapse of a considerable period.

It appears to consist of minute scales, placed one above the other. Chaussier considers it to be formed and reproduced by an excretory action of the true skin; to act like a dry varnish—Stra'tum Cor'neum — which prevents the immediate contact of bodies with the nervous papillæ, and consequently to deaden tactile impressions, which, without its intervention, might be painful. The Epider'mic, Epider'meous, or Epider'moid Sys'tem (as Bichat called it), in general anatomy, comprises three parts: — 1. External Epidermis. 2. Epidermis spread over the mucous membranes. 3. It ascends upwards and inwards, behind the spermatic cord, follows the outer edge of the rectus abdominis muscle, and anastomoses, towards the umbilicus, with the internal mammary. The epigastric artery anastomoses, also, with the obturator, spermatic, lumbar, and intercostal vessels.

of the anterior surface of the epiglottis, in a triangular space, bounded anteriorly by the thyrohyoid membrane and thyroid cartilage. It pours out an unctuous and mucous fluid, which lubricates the epiglottis, keeps it supple and movable, and prevents the larynx from being irritated by the constant passage of the air, in the act of respiration.

Epiglot'tis, gen. Epiglot'tidis, (επιγλωττις, gen. επιγλωττιδος,) Epiglot'tic car'tilage, Lig'ula, Oper'culum laryn'gis, Lin'gua Ex'igna, Lin'gula fis'tulæ, Sublin'guum, Superlig'ula. A fibro-cartilage, situate at the upper part of the larynx, behind the base of the tongue. Its form is oval; texture elastic; thickness greater below than above, and greater in the middle than at the sides. By its smaller extremity, which is the lower, it is attached to the thyroid cartilage; its two surfaces are covered by the mucous membrane of the pharynx and larynx. The special use of the epiglottis would seem to be to cover the glottis accurately at the moment of deglutition, and, thus, to assist in opposing the passage of alimentary substances into the air tubes.

(The word is derived from επιλαμβανω, 'future,' επιλημψω, — ep, and λαμβανω, 'I seize,' — 'I seize upon.') It is a cerebrospinal disease, which may be idiopathic or symptomatic, spontaneous or accidental, and which occurs in paroxysms, with uncertain intervals between. These paroxysms are characterized by loss of consciousness and by convulsive motions of the muscles. Frequently, the fit attacks suddenly; at other times, it is preceded by indisposition, vertigo, and stupor. At times, before the loss of consciousness occurs, a sensation of a cold vapor is felt, hence called aur'a epilep'tica. This appears to rise in some part of the body, proceeds towards the head, and as soon as it has reached the brain the patient falls down. The ordinary duration of a fit is from 5 to 20 minutes. Sometimes it goes off in a few seconds; at others, it is protracted for hours. In all cases, there is a loss of sensation, sudden falling down, distortion of the eyes and face; countenance of a red, purple, or violet color; grinding of the teeth; foaming at the mouth; convulsions of the limbs; difficult respiration, at times stertorous; with, sometimes, involuntary discharge of fæces and urine. After the fit, the patient retains not the least recollection of what has passed, but remains, for some time, affected with headache, stupor, and lassitude.

The disease is cerebrospinal, and is generally organic; but it may be functional and symptomatic of irritation in other parts, as in the stomach, bowels, &c. The prognosis, as to ultimate recovery, is unfavorable. It does not, however, frequently destroy life, but is apt to lead to mental imbecility. Dissection has not thrown light on its pathology.

To the attacks of epilepsy which are unaccompanied by convulsions, as is sometimes the case, the French give the name Petit-mal. The slight attacks are occasionally — often, indeed — preceded by vertigo, (F.) Vertige Épileptique, Épilepsie Vertige, Verti'go epilep'tica, Ma'lum mi'nus, Cer'ebral Ep'ilepsy. The mind of the patient becomes, in the mildest cases, a blank, as it were; and hence the seizures are often described as blanks, faints, forgets, absences, darknesses, &c., consciousness being, as it were, lost for a few seconds. Fully formed epilepsy is the Grand-mal of the French, Spi'nal Ep'ilepsy. When furious mania succeeds to a paroxysm, it is termed Ma'nia epilep'tica and Epilep'tic Delir'ium.

In the treatment, the cause must be sought after, and, if possible, removed. In the paroxysm but little can be done; but as the tongue is liable to be injured by the teeth, the jaws may be kept open by putting a cork or piece of wood between them. If the fit has been brought on by indigestible food, the stomach must be cleared. It is between the paroxysms that the great effort must be made. Generally, there is considerable irritability and debility of the nervous system, and hence tonics have been found the best remedies. Of these, perhaps the most powerful in epilepsy is nitrate of silver, given regularly and continued for months, if necessary. Preparations of iron, copper, and zinc, have also been used, and vegetable tonics and antispasmodics in general. Counter-irritants, as blisters, moxa, &c., may be employed, if necessary, along with this course.

Unfortunately, in many cases, these means are found insufficient, and all that can be done is to palliate, removing carefully the exciting causes; such as the use of spirituous liquors, strong emotions, violent exercise, &c.; and regulating the diet.

It does not generally flow from both nostrils, and is very apt to recur. Puberty is the period at which it is most common. Its exciting causes are :—any thing that will induce local congestions, as running, coughing, blowing the nose, &c., provided there is a disposition to it. A common case of epistaxis requires but little treatment, especially if in a young person. Light diet and a dose or two of the sulphate of magnesia will be sufficient. In more severe attacks, cold and astringent washes of alum, sulphate of zinc, weak sulphuric acid, or creasote, may be used, and the nostrils be plugged anteriorly; but if the bleeding goes on posteriorly, —Choanorrhag''ia — the posterior nares must be plugged likewise, — the patient being kept with the head raised, and on dry diet. The flow of blood has been arrested by directing the patient to stand up with his head elevated, compressing the nostril whence the blood flows with the finger, raising the corresponding arm perpendicularly, and holding it in this position for about two minutes. A less vigorous circulation through the carotids appears to result from the increased force required to carry on the circulation through the upper extremity when raised. To prevent the recurrence, strict diet must be inculcated.

Epister'nal, Episterna'lis, (επι, and στερνον, 'the sternum.') An epithet applied to two bones which form part of the sternum, and are situate upon its superior and lateral part. In all these situations it is continuous with tessellated epithelium, which lines the more delicate ducts of the various glands. For the uses of the cil'iated epithe'lium, Épithe'lium vi'brans, see Cilia.

Mr. Bowman has applied the term spheroid'al to a variety of epithelium, the cells of which, for the most part, retain their primitive roundness; or, being flattened where they touch, acquire a polyhedral figure. At times, these show a disposition to pass into the columnar, or the tessellated variety; and, hence, this form has been called the transit''ional. The spheroidal epithelium is found in the urinary passages, where it succeeds the columnar epithelium of the urethra at the internal orifice of that canal, and lines the whole of the bladder, ureters and pelvis of the kidneys. It is found, also, in the excretory ducts of the mammary, perspiratory, and of many mucous glands; and a modification of it lines the inmost secreting cavities or commencing ducts of glands generally.

Er'got, ([F.] ergot, 'a spur,') Er'gota or Ergo'ta, Seca'lē cornu'tum seu mater'num seu tur'gidum seu temulent'um seu luxu'rians seu clava'tum, Cla'vus secali'nus seu seca'lis seu silig''inis, Spermoē'dia cla'vus, Ma'ter seca'lis, Cal'car, Seca'lis ma'ter, Ustila'go, Frumen'tum cornu'tum seu cornicula'tum seu luxu'rians seu turg''idum seu temulen'tum, Brizoc'eras [?], Melanophy'ma, Spur'red or Horn'ed Rye, Spur, Horn'seed, Cock'spur rye, Cock'spur, (F.) Seigle ergoté ou cornu ou corrompu ou à Éperon ou Ergotisé, Blé cornu, Ergot ou Clou ou Mère de seigle, Bled avorté ou faronche, Faux seigle. Ergot is generally considered to be the result of a disease in rye — Seca'lē cerea'lē — occurring most frequently when a hot summer succeeds a rainy spring. Decandolle, however, regards it as a parasitic fungus, and calls it Sclero'tium cla'vus; while Leveillé esteems it to be a fungus giving a coating to the diseased grain; the medical virtues residing in the coating. This parasitic fungus he calls Sphace'lia seg''etum. More recently, it has been maintained that it is a diseased state of the grain occasioned by the growth of a fungus not previously detected, to which the names Ergotæ'tia abor'tans seu abortifa'ciens, Oï'dium abortifa'ciens, Er'gotmould, have been given. It is found projecting from among the leaves of the spike or ear, and is a long, crooked excrescence, resembling the spur of a cock, pointed at its extremities, of a dark brown color externally, and white within. To the whole fungus, giving rise to Ergota, M. Tulasne has given the name Clav'iceps purpu'rea, and the Pharmacopœia (1873) adopting this view, describes ergot as the sclerotium of Claviceps purpurea, replacing the grain of secale cereale.

Ergot has been long used in Germany to act on the uterus, as its names Mutterkorn and Gebärpulver ('womb-grain,' pul'vis partu'riens, pul'vis ad par'tum) testify. About sixty years ago, it was recommended in this country for accelerating parturition; and since that period it has come into very general use as a parturifacient. Half a drachm of the powder is gently boiled in half a pint of water, and one-third part given every 20 minutes, until proper pains begin. Some recommend the clear watery infusion; others advise the powder or the oil, the wine or the fluid extract. It is obvious that, in many cases, the uterine efforts would return in the period which would necessarily elapse in the administration of ergot; so that several of the cases, at least, of reputed efficacy, may not have been dependent upon the assigned agent. Ergot also possesses, it is affirmed, narcotic virtues, which have rendered it useful in hemorrhagic and other affections of excitement.

Bread, made of spurred rye, has been attended with the effects described under Er'gotism.

The largest received red blood, those which came next received only white, others only lymph, while the last of all were destined for yet more subtile fluids — for a kind of vapor. When the red globules entered vessels destined for the white, or the white those intended for the thinner fluids, there was, according to the theory of Boerhaave, an error loci, the proximate cause of inflammation and other mischiefs. Superficial inflammation of the skin, with general fever, tension, and swelling of the part; the surface smooth and shining as if oiled, Erysip'elas gla'brum; pain and heat more or less acrid; redness diffused, but more or less circumscribed, and disappearing when pressed upon by the finger, but returning as soon as the pressure is removed. Frequently, small vesicles appear upon the inflamed part, which dry up and fall off, under the form of branny scales. Erysipelas is, generally, an acute affection; its medium duration being from 10 to 14 days. When it reaches its acme, and ceases to spread, it has received the name Erysip'elas fix'um. It yields, commonly, to general refrigerant remedies. Topical applications are rarely serviceable. At times, when the disease approaches the phlegmonous character, copious bleeding and other evacuants may be required, as in many cases of erysipelas of the face; but this is not commonly necessary. In most cases, indeed, the general action seems deficient, and it becomes necessary to give tonics.

When erysipelas is of a highly inflammatory character, and invades the parts beneath, it is termed Erysip'elas phlegmono'des, Dermati'tis phlegmono'sa, (F.) Érysipèle phlegmoneux; when accompanied with phlyctenæ, and the inflammation terminates in gangrene, Erysip'elas gangræno'sum, (F.) Érysipèle gangréneux; and when associated with infiltration of serum, Erysip'elas œdamato'sum, (F.) Érysipèle œdémateux; when superficial and tending to spread indefinitely, it is called Erysip'elas errat'icum.

At times the surface in erysipelas has a bronzed rather than a red hue — bronzed erysipelas.

They

constitute the re'flex sys'tem of nerves. See Nerves.

The term excito-motion has also been employed to signify motion, no matter how excited, by the reflex nerves or by volition.

Excitonu'trient and Excitosecre'tory are reflex actions in which nutrition and secretion are modified in parts by impressions made elsewhere and reflected to them, as where tumors disappear or secretions of tears, milk, saliva, for example, are increased, by impressions made on the cerebro-spinal nervous centres.

The average amount of fæces discharged in the 24 hours, has been estimated at from four ounces to six, in cases where the solid food taken may have been forty-five ounces. They contain, with the remains of undigested food, fat and fatty acids, &c. Dr. W. Marcet found in them a peculiar non-nitrogenous, crystallizable matter, slightly alkaline, insoluble in water, but soluble in ether and hot alcohol — ex'cretine; and Dr. Austin Flint, Jr., a crystallizable substance—ster'corine, also soluble in ether and boiling alcohol, but fusing at a much lower temperature than excretine. He considers it to be produced, by transformation, from the cholesterine of the bile.

The existence of an excretory duct was regarded as a distinctive character of the glands properly so called.

The chief active exercises are:—walking, running, dancing, hunting, fencing, playing at ball, cricket, racket, quoits, swimming, declamation, and singing. By this is meant the separation of the dead portions of a bone, tendon, aponeurosis, or cartilage, under the form of lamellæ or small scales. Exfoliation is accomplished by the instinctive action of the parts, and its object is to detach the dead portion from those subjacent, which are still alive. For this purpose the latter throw out fleshy granulations, and a more or less abundant suppuration occurs, which tends to separate the exfoliated part—now become an extraneous body. The ancients distinguished exfoliation into sensible and insensible, according as the dead portions of bone were detached in fragments of greater or less size, or in very thin pieces, and in an almost insensible manner. When the dead part embraces all or almost all the substance of a bone, it takes the name Seques'trum.

Exha'lant Ves'sels, Va'sa exhalan'tia, are very minute, and rise from the arterial capillary system. They are situate in every tissue of the body, and on the surface of the mucous and serous membranes and skin; on which each pours its particular fluid. Bichat distinguished three sets:—1. The external, terminating on the mucous and external dermoid system, where they pour the matter of perspiration. 2. The internal, comprising those of the areolar and medullary tissues, and of synovial surfaces; and, 3. The nutritive exhalants, which vary in each organ where they are found, and preside over the phenomena of composition and increase of every part of the body. The exhalants are the antagonists of the absorbents. They are imaginary, as a distinct set from the capillary vessels.

Judicial investigations relative to the body of the person inhumed. 2. The removal of a body from one cemetery to another; and, 3. The evacuation of cemeteries or sepulchral vaults. The operation is attended with much unpleasant smell and annoyance, and requires the use of disinfecting agents, of which one of the most available is chlorinated lime. See Disinfection. The putrid effluvia from animal substances are not, however, found to excite endemic disease.

The tumor is, in general, round, and presents all the characters of hernia. It is, commonly, readily reducible, and not subject to strangulation. Expecta'tion, Expecta'tio. The word expectation has been applied, in medicine, to that method which consists in observing the progress of diseases, and removing deranging influences, without prescribing active medicines, unless such shall be imperiously required. It consists, in fact, in leaving the disease almost wholly to the efforts of nature, and has been termed the Art of curing diseases by expectation or waiting, Ars sanan'di cum expectatio'nē, Nihilis'mus.

Expec'torant, Expec'torative, Expec'torans, Anacathar'ticus, Sputato'rius, Antibe'chicus, Ptys'magogue, (ex, and pectus, gen. pectoris, 'the breast.') A medicine capable of facilitating or provoking expectoration. There is probably no such thing as a direct expectorant. They all act through the system, or by impressions made on parts at a distance, which, through the medium of general, continuous, or contiguous sympathy, excite the secretory vessels of the air-passages into action. The following are the chief reputed expectorants: — Ammoniacum; Asafœtida; Galbanum; Ipecacuanha; Myroxylon; Myrrha; Inhalations of Iodine, Stramonium, Tar, Burning Wool, Tobacco, &c.; Scilla; Senega, and Tolutanum.

Expe'rience, Experien'tia, Peir'a, Empeir'a, (ex, and πειρα, 'a trial.') A knowledge of things acquired by observation. In medicine, this knowledge can be obtained both by the practitioner's own experience, and by that obtained from tradition and from books. To profit by experience requires a mind capable of appreciating the proper relations between cause and effect; and hence it happens, that false experience, Experien'tia fal'lax, is extremely common; and that a man had better, in many instances, trust to what he has learned from others, than to his own fallacious observation. The union of accurate observation by the physician with that handed down by medical writers constitutes perfect experience, so far as it is attainable in any individual case.

Expérience, Experiment — e. de Mariotte, Mariotte, experiment of.

Experien'tia, Experience.

Exper'iment, Experimen'tum, (F.) Expérience. A trial, made on the bodies of men or animals, for the purpose of detecting the effect of a remedy, or of becoming better acquainted with their structure, functions, or peculiarities. In a more general sense, it means any trial instituted with the intent of becoming better acquainted with anything. By experiments on living animals, we have obtained much valuable information in the various departments of medicine; but particularly in physiology and toxicology.

The act of expelling from the chest the air received during inspiration. 'To expire,' is, also, to emit the last breath, or 'to die.' See Vital capacity.

Ex'piratory, Expiratio'ni inser'viens. Relating or appertaining to expiration. The expiratory muscles are all those which contribute to diminish the cavity of the chest, for the purpose of expelling the air contained in the lungs or of producing expiration. These muscles are, chiefly, the intercostals, triangularis sterni, quadratus lumborum, serratus posticus inferior, oblique and recti muscles of the abdomen, and sacrolumbalis.

It is also applied to the removal of certain parts. The cataract is said to be extracted; a tooth is extracted, when carious, &c.

Ex'tracts, see Extractum — e. Fluid, see Extractum.

Extrac'tum, Ecchylo'ma, Extrac'tio, Ex'tract, (F.) Extrait, Apostolé. An extract is prepared by evaporating vegetable solutions till a tenacious mass is obtained. When prepared from an infusion or decoction, it is called a watery; from ether, an ethereal; and from alcohol, an alcoholic or a spirituous extract. Both kinds contain all the principles of the vegetable that are soluble in the menstrua with which they are prepared; but the volatile parts are dissipated, and some of the fixed parts are decomposed; the proper extractive is oxygenized, and the virtues of the vegetable substance are altered or destroyed. Extracts are hard, soft, or fluid: the consistence of the soft being such as to retain the pilular form without the addition of a powder. A patent was taken out, many years ago, by a Mr. Barry, of London, for preparing them in vacuo; and as the temperature is much lower than in the ordinary method, the virtues of the plant are less altered, and the extracts are generally green. Extracts are also prepared by displacement or percolation. They have, likewise, received different names, according to their predominant principle. The gum'my or mu'cous, or mucilag''inous, are those which are mainly composed of gum or mucilage. Gum tragacanth may be considered a pure gummy extract. Gelat'inous extracts are those composed especially of gelatin; res'inous extracts, those of a resinous character; extrac'tores'inous, those composed of extractive or coloring matter and resin; gumres'inous, those containing gum and resin; and sapona'ceous or sapona'ceous saline', those containing a notable quantity of saline substances and a resinous matter, so combined with mucus and other soluble substances, that they cannot be separated.

Under the name Flu'id Ex'tracts — Extracta Flui'da seu Liq'uida — a class of preparations has been introduced into the Pharmacopœias, the distinctive character of which is the concentration of the active ingredients of medicinal substances into a small bulk, in the liquid form. In the Ph. U. S., 1873, the quantity of powdered material to be used in all the officinal fluid extracts, except of spigelia and senna, is sixteen ounces. In all of them the extraction is effected by percolation, the percolator being covered to prevent evaporation, and the liquid set aside for four days, when percolation is again commenced, and continued until twenty-four fluidounces are obtained, of which the first fourteen are reserved, and the remainder evaporated to two fluidounces, and mixed with the reserved portion, and filtered.

A pint of tincture is made by percolation, which is evaporated spontaneously to three ounces, and the process of percolation continued until two pints more of tincture are obtained, or the powder is exhausted. It is then evaporated by means of a water-bath, at a temperature not exceeding 160°, to the consistence of syrup, to which the three ounces of tincture are now added. The eye is the immediate organ of vision. It is seated in the orbit, while its dependencies, called by Haller Tutam'ina Oc'uli, occupy the circumference of the cavity, and are composed of the eyebrows, the eyelids, cilia, glands of Meibomius, &c. The Ball, Globe, or Bulb of the Eye, Bul'bus Oc'uli, is covered anteriorly by the tunica conjunctiva; is moved by six muscles, four straight, two oblique; and is constituted of membranes, as the sclerotic, cornea, choroid, tunica Jacobi, retina, iris, hyaloid, and, in the fœtus, the membrana pupillaris; and of fluids, called humors, or media, — the aqueous, crystalline, and vitreous. The eyeball is invested with a membranous tunic, which separates it from the other structures of the orbit, and forms a smooth, hollow surface, by which its motions are facilitated. This investment has been called cell'ular cap'sule of the eye, oc'ular capsule, tu'nica vagina'lis oc'uli, vag''inal coat, and submus'cular fas'cia of the eye. The vessels of the eye proceed from the ophthalmic artery. The nerves, except the optic, are chiefly furnished from the ophthalmic ganglion. The fundus of the eye — fun'dus oc'uli — is the part of the organ lying behind the lens and vitreous humor, and embracing the entrance for the optic nerve, the retina, choroid, sclerotic, and blood-vessels. The following are the dimensions, &c., of the organ, on the authority of Petit, Young, Gordon, and Brewster:

Face, Fa'cies, Vul'tus, Vol'tus, Proso'pon, Sto'ma, (F.) Face, (facere, 'to make or form.') The face is the anterior part of the head. It is formed of 13 bones, — the two superior maxillary, the two malar, the two ossa nasi, the two ossa unguis, the vomer, the two ossa spongiosa inferiora, the two palate bones, and the inferior maxillary, without including the frontal portion of the os frontis, and the 32 teeth, which may be considered to form part of it. Its numerous muscles are chiefly destined for the organs of sight, hearing, taste, and smell. Its arteries proceed from the external carotid: its veins end in the jugular; its nerves originate immediately from the brain.

The face experiences alterations in disease, which it is important to attend to. It is yellow in jaundice; pale and puffy in dropsy; and its expression is very different according to the seat of irritation, so that, in infants, by an attention to medical physiognomy, we can often detect the seat of disease. Hippocrates has well depicted the change which it experiences in one exhausted by long sickness, by great evacuations, excessive hunger, watchfulness, &c., threatening dissolution. Hence this state has been called Fa'cies Hippocrat'ica, Fa'cies Cadaver'ica, Fa'cies Tortua'lis. In this, the nose is pinched; the eyes are sunk; the temples hollow; the ears cold and retracted; the skin of the forehead tense, and dry; the complexion livid; the lips pendent, relaxed, and cold, &c. The face assumes also a peculiar characteristic appearance in cholera, fa'cies choler'ica — in cancer, can'cerous fa'cies — in tuberculosis, tuber'cular fa'cies.

The term Face (F.) is likewise given to one of the aspects of an organ; thus, we say, the superior face of the stomach.

They contain free carbonic acid; carbonate, sulphate, and phosphate of soda; chloride of sodium; carbonates of lime, magnesia, and iron, and form an agreeable antacid drink in some forms of dyspepsia.

Fa'cial An'gle, see Angle, facial.

Fa'cial Ar'tery. La'bial ar'tery, An'gular or exter'nal max'illary ar'tery, A. palato-labial (Ch.), is a branch of the external carotid, which rises beneath the digastricus, and is distributed to almost every part of the face. It furnishes the inferior palatal, submental, superior labial, inferior labial, and dorsalis nasi. Chaussier calls the external carotid artery, Artère Faciale, Facial Artery.

Fa'cial Line, see Angle, facial.

This nerve arises from the inferior and lateral part of the tuber annulare, in the groove which separates it from the medulla oblongata, external to the corpora olivaria, and by the side of the auditory nerve. It issues from the cranium by the meatus auditorius internus; enters the aqueduct of Fallopius; receives a branch of the Vidian nerve; forms a gangliform swelling—Intumescen'tia gangliform'is; — sends off filaments to the internal muscles of the malleus and stapes; furnishes, according to many anatomists, that called chor'da tym'pani; makes its exit at the foramen stylo-mastoideum, and divides into two branches—the temporo-facial, and cervico-facial. On the face it is termed Pes anseri'nus, Plex'us nervo'rum anseri'nus. See Portio Wrisbergii.

Fa'cial Vein, Pal'ato-labial (Ch.), arises between the skin and frontalis muscle, and bears the name Ve'na Fronta'lis, V. Præpara'ta, (F.) Veine frontale ou V. Préparate. It then descends, vertically, towards the greater angle of the eye, where it is called Angula'ris; and afterwards descends, obliquely, on the face, to open into the internal jugular, after having received branches, which correspond with those of the facial artery. It is only in the latter part of its course that it is called Facial Vein.

Faciec'ula, (dim. of Facies,) Facet.

Fa'cient, (faciens, 'making,' facio, 'I make.') A suffix, as in Calefacient, Rubefacient, &c., 'making warm,' 'making red.'

The power of executing any function or act. The collection of the intellectual faculties constitutes the understanding. We say, also, vital faculties, for vital properties, &c. Faculty likewise means the whole body of the medical profession; also, a body of medical or other professors.

The systematic name of the plant, which affords Tacamaha'ca, a resinous substance, that exudes from the tree Tacamahaca, which has a fragrant, delightful smell, was formerly in high estimation, as an ingredient in warm, stimulating plasters, and was given internally, like the balsams generally. The East In'dia Tacamahac', Bal'samum Vir'idē seu Cal'aba seu Ma'riæ, O'leum Ma'riæ, (F.) *Baume de Calaba, Baume vert, B. Fall'tranck, Faltranck (G.), literally, a drink against falls. A vulnerary. It is a mixture of several aromatic and slightly astringent plants, which grow chiefly in the Swiss Alps, and hence the name — Vulnéraire Suisse — given to such dried plants cut into fragments. They are called, also, Espéces Vulnéraires, and Thé Suisse. Within the present century, in England, a kind of vulnerary beer was often prescribed, in country practice, in all cases of inward bruises. It bore the name Cerevis'ia ni'gra or black beer, and was formed by infusing certain reputed vulnerary herbs in beer or ale.

The infusion of the Falltranck is aromatic and slightly agreeable, but of no use in the cases for which it has been particularly recommended.

Falsifica'tion, Adultera'tio, (falsus, 'false,' and facere, 'to make.') A fraudulent imitation or alteration of an aliment or medicine by different admixtures. It is synonymous with adultera'tion and sophistica'tion. By Dr. Hassall, the practice of adulteration is defined as the intentional addition to an article, for purposes of gain or deception, of any substance or substances, the presence of which is not acknowledged in the name under which the article is sold.

The following table was prepared to indicate common falsifications practised with some of the most useful drugs. Of late years, increased attention has been drawn to the alarming extent to which the adulterations of both drugs and aliments have been carried. The object has been seriously examined and reported on by a committee of the British House of Commons, and two elaborate works have been published by Dr. Hassall — the one "On Food and its Adulterations," (1855); and the other entitled, "Adulterations Detected" (1857), both in food and medicines, comprising the Reports of the Analytical Sanitary Commission of "the Lancet," &c., &c., (1857.) The principal means for the detection of such adulterations are afforded by chemistry and the microscope. The former has always been employed for the purpose, but the latter only recently. It is especially adapted for the detection of animal and vegetable admixtures, on the presence of which chemistry can shed little or no light. The distinctive characters of many of the pure articles employed in medicine are given in the Pharmacopœias, as in that of the United States (1873).

Medicines.	Adulterations.	Mode of Detection.
Acaciæ Gummi. Gum Arabic.	Gum Senegal	Gum Senegal is clammy and tenacious. Gum Arabic is perfectly soluble in water, and its solution limpid.
Acetum Destillatum. Distilled Vinegar.	Sulphuric Acid	Acetate of barytes causes a white precipitate.
	Nitric Acid	By evaporating it, the residuum deflagrates, when thrown on burning charcoal.
	Copper	Supersaturate with ammonia—a blue colour is produced.
	Lead	Sulphuretted hydrogen causes a dark precipitate.
Acidum Arseniosum. Arsenious Acid.	Chalk, Sulphate of Lime, Sulphate of Baryta.	Not volatizable by heat.
Acidum Citricum. Citric Acid.	Tartaric and Oxalic Acids	Their presence is indicated by forming a granular sediment in a concentrated solution of a neutral salt of potassa.
Acidum Muriaticum. Muriatic Acid.	Sulphuric Acid	Deposits by evaporation the salts it may contain; precipitates with solution of hydrochlorate of baryta if it contains sulphuric acid.
Acidum Nitricum. Nitric Acid.	Muriatic and Sulphuric Acids.	The presence of chlorine is indicated by a precipitate with nitrate of silver: that of sulphuric acid by the same result with hydrochlorate of baryta.
Acidum Sulphuricum. Sulphuric Acid.	Muriatic and Nitric Acids	The presence of muriatic and nitric acid is indicated by the smell, when the acid tested is strongly heated.
Æther Rectificatus. Rectified Ether.	Too dilute.	The s. g. detects this.
	Sulphuric Acid	By acetate of baryta. Precipitate white.
	Alcohol	With phosphorus a milky instead of limpid solution is formed.
Ammoniæ Aqua. Water of Ammonia. Ammoniæ Carbonas. Carbonate of Ammonia.	Carbonic Acid	A precipitation occurs on adding a solution of muriate of lime. It should be capable of complete volatilization by heat.
Ammoniacum Ammoniac.		The Guttæ Ammoniaci are white, clear, and dry. The lump Ammoniacum, lapis Ammoniaci, is often adulterated with common resin.
Antimonii Sulphuretum. Sulphuret of Antimony.	.....	It ought to be entirely volatilized by a red heat.
	Lead.	Imparts a foliated texture, and is not vaporizable.
	Arsenic	A smell of garlic is emitted when thrown on live coals.
	Manganese and Iron.	Are not vaporizable.

Medicines.	Adulterations.	Mode of Detection.
Argenti Nitras Nitrate of Silver.	Copper	The solution assumes a blue colour, when supersaturated with ammonia. It may be suspected when the salt deliquesces.
	Nitrate of Potassa	The adulteration with nitrate of potassa is easily recognized by the fracture of a stick of it, which is radiated when pure, and granular if adulterated: or by precipitating a solution of the salts with a sufficient quantity of muriatic acid, and evaporating the clear liquor: the nitrate of potassa or other salts will remain.
Balsamum Peruvianum. Balsam of Peru.	A mixture of Resin and some Volatile Oil, with Benzoin.	Not easily detected.
Calumba. Columbo.	A menisperm from Ceylon, tinged Bryony root, and the root of Frasera Walteri.	The true is distinguishable from the false Columbo by adding to an infusion of the root, a few drops of solution of sulph. iron, which gives to the infusion of the false Columbo a greenish black colour; but produces no change in the other.
Capsicum. Cayenne Pepper.	Chloride of Sodium	This disposes it to deliquesce.
	Red Lead	Digest in acetic acid, and add a solution of sulphuret of ammonia—a dark-coloured precipitate will be produced.
Castoreum. Castor.	A mixture of dried blood, gum ammoniac, and a little real castor, stuffed into the scrotum of a goat.	Smell and taste will generally detect the fraud.
Cera Alba. White Wax.	White Lead	Melt the wax, the oxide will subside.
	Tallow	The cake has not its ordinary translucency.
Cera Flava. Yellow Wax.	Earth or Peasmeal	May be suspected when the cake is brittle and colour grayish.
	Resin	Put it in cold alcohol, which will dissolve the resin, without acting on the wax.
	Tallow	Is known by the greater softness and unctuosity, and its smell when melted. Turmeric is generally added in this case to obviate the paleness.
Cinchona. Bark.	This is variously adulterated, but generally with the Carthagena and other inferior barks.	Can only be detected by practice, and examining into the quantity of quinia, or cinchonia, or both, which it contains.
Coccus. Cochineal.	Pieces of dough formed in moulds, and coloured with cochineal.	Throw it into water, the adulteration will appear.
Copaiba. Balsam of Copaiva.	Fixed Oils.	If it does not retain its spherical form when dropped into water, its adulteration may be inferred. Mix one part of strong liquid ammonia of 22°, with three parts of copaiba. If pure, the mixture will, in a few minutes, become transparent; if not, it will remain opake.
	Fibres of smoked Beef	Affords an unpleasant odour when thrown on live coals.
Crocus. Saffron.	Petals of Calendula officinalis, and Carthamus Tinctorius.	Infuse the specimen in hot water, and the difference will be perceptible.
Cubeba. Cubebs.	Turkey Yellow Berries, or the dried fruit of Rhamnus Catharticus.	Detected by attentive examination.
Cusparlæ Cortex. Angustura or Cusparia Bark.	False Angustura sometimes sold for it.	The epidermis of the true Cusparia is characterized by being covered with a matter resembling the rust of iron. False cusparia bark yields brucia and strychnia; the true yields neither.
Guiaci Resina. Resin of Guaiacum.	Common Resin	Detected by the turpentine smell emitted when thrown upon hot coals.
	Manchineel Gum	Add to the tincture a few drops of the spirit of nitre, and dilute with water; the guaiacum is precipitated—the adulteration floats in white striæ.
Hydrargyri Chloridum Mite. Calomel.	Corrosive Sublimate and Subnitrate of Bismuth.	A precipitation will be produced by the carbonate of potassa, from a solution made by boiling the suspected sample with a small portion of muriate of ammonia in distilled water; or, the presence of deutochloride of mercury is indicated by warming gently a small quantity of calomel in alcohol, filtering and adding to the clear liquor some limewater, by which a reddish yellow precipitate is afforded. When calomel is rubbed with a fixed alkali, it ought to become intensely black, and not exhibit any orange hue.
	Carbonate of Lead, Sulphate of Baryta, and Carbonate of Baryta.	Not volatilized by heat,—the carbonates effervesce with acids.
Hydrargyri Oxidum Rubrum. Red Oxide of Mercury.	Red Lead, Red Oxide of Iron, Brick Dust.	Digest in acetic acid: add sulphuret of ammonia, which will produce a dark coloured precipitate. It should be totally volatilized by heat.
Hydrargyri Sulphuretum Nigrum.	Ivory Black	Throw a suspected portion on hot coals—the residuum will detect the fraud.
Hydrargyri Sulphuretum Rubrum. Red Sulphuret of Mercury.	Red Lead, Red Oxide of Iron, Brick Dust.	Digest in acetic acid, and add sulphuret of ammonia—a black precipitate will be produced. Does not wholly sublime like the genuine article.
Iodinium. Iodine.	Plumbago, Charcoal, and Oxide of Manganese.	The tests of its purity are—that it is freely soluble in ether and alcohol. Heated on a piece of glass or porcelain, it sublimes without residuum, rising in purple vapour. With starch in cold solution it produces a blue colour.
Jalapæ Radix. Jalap Root.	Bryony Root, spurious or false Jalap Root, and Liquorice Root.	Bryony root is of a paler colour, and less compact texture, and does not easily burn at the flame of a candle. Liquorice is detected by the taste.

Medicines.	Adulterations.	Modes of Detection.
Magnesia.	Lime	Detected by the solution in dilute sulphuric acid affording a precipitate with oxalate of ammonia.
	Sulphuret of Lime	Gives off, when moistened, the smell of sulphuretted hydrogen.
Magnesiæ Carbonas. Carbonate of Magnesia.	Chalk	Detected by adding dilute sulphuric acid to the suspected substance, when, if chalk be present, there will be a white insoluble precipitate.
	Gypsum	Boil in distilled water, and test the solution by a barytic and oxalic reagent.
Manna.	A factitious article, consisting of honey or sugar, mixed with scammony, is said to be sometimes sold for it.	The colour, weight, transparency, and taste detect it.
Morphia et ejus Sales. Morphia, and its Salts.		Morphia and its salts, when placed in contact with nitric acid, are coloured red; with persalts of iron, blue. They are perfectly soluble in warm alcohol, and acidulated warm water. When morphia is mixed with narcotina, the adulteration is ascertained by mixing them with sulphuric ether, which dissolves the narcotina, without sensibly affecting the morphia.
Moschus. Musk.	Dried Blood	The bag must not appear to have been opened. This may be suspected, if it emits a fetid smoke when inflamed.
	Asphaltum	Discovered by its melting and running before it inflames.
	Fine particles of Lead	Rub with water. The metallic particles will subside.
Olea Destillata. Essential Oils.	Fixed Oils	Touch writing paper with it, and hold it before the fire: fixed oil leaves a stain of grease.
	Alcohol	Add water; a milkiness and increase of temperature occurs.
Oleum Ricini. Castor Oil.	Olive or Almond or Poppy Oil.	Alcohol S. g. .820 will mix with any proportion of castor oil, whilst it dissolves very little of the others.
Opium.	Extract of Liquorice, Bullets and Stones sometimes; Extract of Poppy, of Chelidonium majus, and other vegetables. Molasses, G. Arabic. G. Tragacanth, Linseed Oil, Cow's Dung.	The best opium is covered with leaves and the reddish capsules of a species of Rumex. The inferior kinds have capsules adherent. It is bad when soft and friable, when intensely black or mixed with many impurities, and when sweet. The quantity of morphia affords the best test.
Potassii Iodidum. Iodide of Potassium.	Chlorides of Potassium, and Sodium, Nitrate and Carbonate of Potassa.	The adulteration is ascertained by precipitating a solution of the salt with nitrate of silver, and treating the precipitate with ammonia, which dissolves the chloride of silver, without acting upon the iodide of this metal.
Quiniæ Sulphas. Sulphate of Quinia.	Mannite, Sugar of Milk, Starch, Chalk.	The genuine salt leaves no residue when submitted to calcination; is perfectly soluble in warm alcohol, and in water slightly acidulated with sulphuric acid.
Strychniæ et ejus Sales. Strychnia and its Salts.	Brucia	By the red color produced by contact with nitric acid.
Zinci Oxydum. Oxide of Zinc.	Chalk and Carbonate of Magnesia.	Sulphuric acid excites an effervescence.
	White Lead	Sulphuric acid forms an insoluble sulphate of lead.

It is attached, externally, to the inner edge of the crest of the ilium, below and anteriorly, — on one side to the crural arch, sending an expansion to the fascia transversalis; and on the other, continuous with the deep-seated lamina of the fascia lata, which forms the posterior paries of the crural canal. Within and behind, the fascia iliaca is attached to the brim of the pelvis, and is continuous with the aponeurosis, which M. Jules Cloquet has called Pel'vian. The iliac aponeurosis covers the iliac and psoas muscles, which it separates from the peritoneum.

Fas'cia Infundib'uliformis, Inter'nal Spermat'ic Fas'cia, is a funnel-shaped offset from the fascia transversalis, which is prolonged as a sheath upon the vas deferens and spermatic vessels as they pass out of the abdomen.

Fas'cia La'ta. A name given by anatomists to an aponeurosis, and to a muscle: —

Fas'cia La'ta Aponeuro'sis, F. aponeurot'ica fem'oris, Vagi'na fem'oris, Cru'ral or Fem'oral Aponeuro'sis, is the most extensive in the body, and envelopes all the muscles of the thigh. Above, it is attached to the outer edge of the ilia; before, it arises from the crural arch by two distinct laminæ, separated by the femoral vessels, and becoming confounded a little below the part where the great vena saphæna opens into the crural vein. Of these two laminæ, the one is more anterior and thicker than the other, and may be considered as a prolongation of the aponeurosis of the external oblique; it is intimately united to Poupart's ligament. The other, which is thinner, is behind, and deeper seated, and, after its union with the former, proceeds to be inserted into the pubis. In attaching itself to the pectineal line, under the name of Hey's lig'ament, or Hey's fem'oral ligament, it helps to form Gimbernat's lig'ament. Inferiorly, the fascia lata becomes confounded with the tendon of the triceps, and is attached to the external tuberosity of the tibia. The use of the fascia lata, like that of other aponeuroses, is to strengthen the action of muscles, &c.

Fas'cia La'ta Mus'cle, Ten'sor vagi'næ fem'oris, Fascia'lis, Membrano'sus, Mus'culus aponeuro'sis seu fas'ciæ la'tæ seu fem'oris membrano'sus, (F.) Ilio-aponévrosi-fémoral, Ilio-aponévroti-fémoral (Ch.), Tenseur de l'aponévrose fémorale. A muscle, situate at the upper and outer part of the thigh. It arises, above, from the outer part of the anterior and superior spine of the ilium; and is inserted, below, between the two laminæ of the fascia lata, which it stretches and raises when it contracts.

Fas'cia Lumbo'rum, Lum'bar Fascia. A fascia formed by the blending of the posterior layer of the vertebral aponeurosis of the transversalis with the aponeurosis of the Serratus posticus inferior and Latissimus dorsi muscles.

Fas'cia Pro'pria. A layer of areolar tissue derived from the sheath of the femoral vessels—or, according to some, from the cribriform fascia. It is one of the coverings of femoral hernia, and is generally pretty dense about the neck of the hernia; but thin or even wanting on its fundus.

Fas'cia Rec'to-Ves'ical. The visceral layer of the pelvic fascia, investing the prostate, bladder, and rectum.

Fas'cia, Superfic''ial, Fi'bro-are'olar Fascia. A fascia immediately beneath the integument over almost the entire surface of the body, facilitating the movement of the skin, connecting with the parts beneath, &c.

Fas'cia Superficia'lis Abdom'inis, Superfic''ial aponeuro'sis of the abdo'men and thigh, (F.) Aponévrose superficielle de l'abdomen et de la cuisse. A very thin aponeurosis, which covers the muscles and aponeuroses of the abdomen; passes before the crural arch, to which it adheres with some degree of force; sends a membranous sheath, which surrounds the spermatic cord, and is continuous with the dartos, which it assists in forming. The fascia superficialis presents, beneath the crural arch, very distinct fibres, whose direction is parallel to the fold of the thigh. It is applied over the fascia lata aponeurosis, and is attached, internally, to the ascending ramus of the ischium, near the root of the corpus cavernosum. Before the descent of the testicle from the abdomen, the fascia superficialis is very manifestly continuous with the Gubernac'ulum tes'tis.

Fas'cia, Tem'poral, Temporal aponeurosis.

Fas'cia of Tenon. The tunica vaginalis bulbi or capsule of Bonnet, is blended with the sheaths and expansion of the straight muscles of the eye, and closely adherent to the sclerotica as far forwards as the corneal edge. The latter portion of this membrane has been called the fascia or membrane of Tenon. Between this fascia and the sclerotica is the space of Tenon. See Capsule of Bonnet.

Fas'cia Tformis, T bandage—f. Tortilis, Tourniquet.

Fas'cia Transversa'lis, F. Cooperi. An aponeurosis, which separates the transversalis muscle from the peritoneum in the inguinal region. It arises above the posterior edge of the crural arch, where it seems to be continuous with the aponeurosis of the greater oblique muscle. Above, it is lost in the areolar tissue at the internal surface of the transversalis abdominis. Within, it is continuous with the outer edge of the tendon of the rectus muscle and Gimbernat's ligament; below, it is continuous with the aponeurosis of the greater oblique, and receives an expansion from the Fascia Iliaca. Towards its middle and a little above the crural arch, the fascia transversalis has the wide orifice of a canal, which is occupied, in the female, by the round ligament of the uterus; and in man, furnishes an expansion, that serves as a sheath to the spermatic vessels.

Fat, ([G.] fett, [Sax.] fætt,) Pingue'do, Pim'elē, Pi'ar, Li'pē, Li'pos, Ste'ar, A'deps, Se'vum, Se'bum, Cor'pus adipo'sum, Axun'gia, (F.) Graisse. A soft, white, animal substance; inodorous; insipid; oily; inflammable; easy to melt; spoiling in the air, and becoming rancid by union with oxygen; almost insoluble in alcohol; insoluble in water; soluble in fixed oils. Fat is formed of the immediate principles, stearin, margarin, and olein or elain, all of which are regarded as salts composed of stearic, margaric, and oleic acids, and a common base, to which, from its sweetish taste, the name Glyc''erin, Glyc''erine, Glyceri'na, Glyceri'num, (F.) Glycérine has been given. To these are, almost always, joined an odorous and a coloring principle.

Fat is found in a number of animal tissues, and is very abundant in the neighborhood of the kidneys and in the epiploon. It is generally fluid in the cetacea; soft, and of a strong smell in the carnivora; solid, and inodorous in the ruminating animal; white, and abundant in young animals; and yellowish in old. It generally forms about a twentieth part of the weight of the human body. The fat, considered physiologically, has, for its function, to protect the organs, maintain their temperature, and to serve for nutrition in case of need; as is observed in torpid animals.

Glycerin, Glyceri'na, was introduced into the edition of the Pharmacopœia of the U. S. (1851), in which it was directed to be prepared as follows: — Lead plaster, recently prepared and yet fluid, and boiling water, of each a gallon; mix; stir briskly for 15 minutes; allow it to cool, and pour off the liquid. Evaporate until it has the s. g. 1·15, and pass slowly through it a current of sulphohydric acid until a black precipitate is no longer thrown down. Filter and boil until the sulphohydric acid is driven off, and evaporate the liquid until it ceases to lose weight.

Glycerin is a colorless or straw-colored syrupy fluid; s. g. 1·25. It has also received the names Glyc''eric Al'cohol, Hy'drate of Glyc''eryl, Gly'cyl or Pro'penyl. It is soluble in water and in alcohol, but not in ether. It is used in the form of lotion, composed of half an ounce to ten fluidounces of water, in cutaneous diseases, as psoriasis, pityriasis, lepra, and ichthyosis. It keeps the part moist, as it does not evaporate readily. A Glycerin oint'ment may be made of Spermaceti, ℥ss., White wax, ʒj., Oil of almonds, f℥ij., Glycerin, f℥j. Melt the spermaceti and wax with the oil, and incorporate the glycerin in a mortar. It may be used wherever a mild ointment is demanded. Solutions of other substances in glycerin have been variously styled glyc''eroles, glyc''erines, glyc''erates, glyc''erites, glycera'ta, glyceri'na, (F.) glycerolés, glycerés. The last edition of the U. S. Ph. (1873) adopts the term glycerita, glycerites. Its solvent powers are remarkable, a very large number of dissimilar substances being soluble in it. It is thus a valuable excipient for medicines. With iodine, it forms iodized glycerin (see Iodine). Internally, glycerin is alterative and nutritive, and has sometimes been prescribed as a substitute for cod-liver oil.

Relating to fat. Resembling or containing fat. The cellular membrane has been called fatty or ad'ipous; from an opinion that, in its areolæ, the fat is deposited. The areolar membrane, however, merely lodges, between its lamellæ and filaments, the vesicles in which the fat is contained.

Fat'ty Ves'icles, Sac'culi adipo'si, Ad'ipous ves'icles, Fat cells. This name is given to small bursæ or membranous vesicles which enclose the fat, and are found situate in the areolæ of the areolar tissue. These vesicles vary much in size. Generally, they are round and globular; and, in certain subjects, receive vessels which are very apparent. They form so many small sacs without apertures, in the interior of which are filaments arranged like septa. In fatty subjects, the adipous vesicles are very perceptible, being attached to the areolar tissue and neighboring parts by a vascular pedicle. Raspail affirms that there is the most striking analogy between the nature of adipose granules and of amylaceous grains.

Fat'ty Ves'sels, Ad'ipous ves'sels. The vessels connected with the fat. Some anatomists have called Adipous canals, (F.) Conduits adipeux, the vessels to which they attribute the secretion of fat.

Internally, he gave a tablespoonful night and morning, with f℥ss. of syrup of poppies, of a mixture containing arsenious acid, gr. ij., rhubarb, ℥ss., syrup of chicory, q. s., distilled water, Oj.

Fe'cal, Stercoraceous — f. Matter, see Fæces.

Féces, Fæces.

Fécondation, Fecundation.

Fécondité, Fecundity.

Fec'ula, Fæ'cula, (dim. of fæces.) An immediate principle of vegetables, composed of hydrogen, oxygen, and carbon. It exists in several plants, and has different names, according to that which furnishes it. (F.) Fécule, Amydolé. When extracted from wheat or barley, it is called Starch, Amylum. When from Cy'cas circina'lis, Sa'go; — from Or'chis mo'rio, Salep. We say, also, Fecula of the Potato, Bryony, Arum, Manioc, &c.

Fec'ula Green. This name is given to a green, solid matter, of variable character, which is believed to be resinous, and which renders turbid several kinds of juices extracted from vegetables. It is also called Chlo'rophyll.

Fécule, Fecula.

Fec'ulence, Fæculen'tia, Fæcos'itas, Fæx, (plural Fæ'ces,) Lem'ma, Lee, Depos'it, Dregs. In Pharmacy, feculent, albuminous, or other substances, which are deposited from turbid fluids.

Fec'ulent, Fæculen'tus, Hypot'rygus, Trygo'des. 'Foul, dreggy, excrementitious;' as a feculent fluid, feculent evacuations, &c.

Fec'und, Fecun'dus, Fœcun'dus, (F.) Fécond. Fruitful, prolific.

Fecunda'tion, Fœcunda'tio, Impregna'tion, Imprægna'tio, Ingravida'tio, Prægna'tio, Gravida'tio, Prægna'tus, Fructifica'tio, Cye'sis, Encye'sis, Encymo'sia, Procrea'tion, (F.) Fécondation. The act by which, in organized beings, the material furnished by the generative organs of the female unites with that prepared by those of the male, so that a new being results.

Fecun'dity, Eutoc'ia, Polygon'ia, Polytoc'ia, Fœcun'ditas, Productiv'itas, (F.) Fécondité. The faculty of reproduction, possessed by organized bodies.

It has been estimated that, throughout a country, taking one marriage with another, not more than 4 children are the result; and in towns only 35 children in 10 marriages. Fecundity has been used to signify the capability to bear children; fertility, the amount of births.

Fee, Pyschorages, Sostrum.

Feeble, ([F.] Faible, 'weak,') Infirm.

Feet, Burn'ing of the. A singular cachectic disease, described by Mr. Malcolmson as occurring in India, the prominent symptom of which was a sense of burning in the feet.

Fégarite, Cancer aquaticus, Stomatitis, pseudomembranous.

Feign'ed Diseases, Mor'bi dissimula'ti seu simula'ti seu cela'ti seu infitia'ti seu pseuda'lei, Sim'ulated or Pretend'ed diseases, (F.) Maladies dissimulées ou simulées ou feintes ou supposées. The tricks employed by impostors to induce a belief that they are attacked with diseases when they are not. These are generally assumed by beggars to obtain alms; by criminals to escape punishment; and by soldiers to be exempt from duty, or to be discharged from the service.

The following table exhibits the chief feigned, pretended, simulated, or excited diseases, or disqualifications, with the means of detection:

Diseases, &c.	How Feigned.	How Detected.
Abortion.	By staining the clothes and body with borrowed blood.
Abstinence.		By constant and minute attention.
Amaurotic Blindness.	By applying the extract of belladonna or datura stramonium to the eye.	Amaurosis is characterized by dilated pupil. Where these substances have been applied, the effects will go off in ten days or a fortnight.
Aphonia.		By anæsthetics, and, under their use, or otherwise, taking the person off his guard.
Apoplexy.	By falling down as if deprived of sensation and consciousness.	By powerful stimulants; an electric shock; application of hot water, sternutatories, actual cautery, &c.
Cachexia, Anæmia, and Debility.	Using substances to make the face appear pale and livid. Indulging freely in wine, and privation of sleep prior to examination.	By examining if the pulse be strong, and the skin hot, and whether there be loss of appetite or of strength, or swelling of the limbs, or unmistakable feebleness of the vital actions.

Diseases, &c.	How Feigned.	How Detected.
Calculi, Excretion of.	Putting sand, pebbles, &c., into the urine.	By the aid of chemistry. We are acquainted with the chemical composition of urinary calculi.
Cancerous Ulcer.	By gluing on a portion of a spleen with the smooth side to the skin, leaving on the outside the appearance of an ulcerated surface.	By noticing whether there be signs of cachexia, and by attentive examination of the part.
Catalepsy.	By seeming to be suddenly motionless, the joints remaining flexible, and external objects making no impression.	By powerful stimulants, as recommended under apoplexy. Letting fall a drop of boiling water on the back. Proposing to use the actual cautery, and seeing whether the pulse rises.
Chorea.	By assuming the convulsive motions of a part which characterize chorea.	By examining the patient while he may imagine himself unobserved, and seeing whether the convulsive motions go on. By anæsthetics, as under Aphonia.
Contraction of Joints in General.	.....	Mode of discrimination sometimes so obscure as to deceive the most practiced and attentive. By anæsthetics, as under Aphonia.
Contraction of the Fingers.	.....	Introduce a cord between the fingers and the palm of the hand, and gradually apply weights so as to expand the fingers. Confine him so that he cannot obtain his food without using his clenched hand. By anæsthetics, as under Aphonia.
Convulsions.	.....	When feigned, they do not present the rigidity of muscles or the rapidity of action which characterize the real. The mode of detection must be the same as in epilepsy.
Cornea, Opaque.	Produced by the application of a strong acid, by acrid powders, as quicklime, &c.	The existence of the opacity can be detected by attentive observation.
Cutaneous Diseases.	Some articles of diet will bring on urticaria or nettlerash, in particular individuals, as shellfish, bitter almonds, &c. By acrids, acids, or any irritants applied to the surface. An ointment of tartarized antimony causes a painful pustular eruption. See Porrigo, in this list.	By careful watching and examination on the part of practitioner and nurse.
Deafdumbness.	.....	The really deaf and dumb acquire an expression of countenance and gestures which it is difficult to assume. By anæsthetics, as under Aphonia.
Deafness.	It may be assumed or excited by putting a pea in the ear, or by inserting irritants, so as to induce inflammation and temporary loss of function.	Make a noise when not expected, and see if the countenance varies or pulse rises. Put to sleep by opium, and then fire a pistol close to the ear, when he may be thrown off his guard. Examine the ear to see if any trick has been played there. By anæsthetics, as under Aphonia.
Death.	Some persons possess the power of suspending or moderating the action of the heart.	If suspected, the plan recommended under Apoplexy will be found most efficacious.
Debility, see Cachexia.
Deformity.	.....	Examine the part and its articulation naked, and compare it with the opposite.
Delirium.	.....	Real delirium is accompanied by bodily disease; with general wandering and incoherency. The feigned is more confined to special subjects.
Delivery.	After enlargement produced artificially, a subsidence of the tumefaction; the parts being moistened by borrowed blood, and the child of another substituted as the female's own.	Can only be positively detected by examination per vaginam. Soon after delivery, the vagina will be relaxed and the lochial discharge be flowing in greater abundance, the shorter the time that may have elapsed since delivery.
Diarrhœa.	Said to have been caused by a mixture of vinegar and burnt cork. May be occasioned by the use of any of the purgative roots, &c.	When diarrhœa is feigned by the lower classes, inspect the linen; if clean, the bowels are probably not much out of order. Let every individual have a close stool of his own; and inspect the evacuations, taking care that one suffering under the disease does not lend his evacuations to another.
Dropsy.	May be feigned, like pregnancy, by wearing pads. The anasarcous condition of the lower limbs has been caused by applying a ligature round them. By inflating the cellular membrane of the abdomen.	Can be detected by attentive examination. There will be a want of that leucophlegmatic habit which accompanies and characterizes dropsy.
Dysentery.	May be feigned, like diarrhœa, by adding a little blood to the evacuations, or by introducing a soap, or some more irritating, suppository.	Same rules as under Diarrhœa.

Diseases, &c.	How Feigned.	How Detected.
Epilepsy.	The foaming of the mouth has been produced by keeping a piece of soap in it.	Sensation in epilepsy is totally abolished. If any remain, disease probably feigned. Incontractility of pupil, which occurs in epilepsy, cannot be feigned. Same means to be used as in feigned apoplexy.
Fever.	By various stimulants, as wine, brandy, pepper; swallowing a small quantity of tobacco, or introducing it into the anus. Flour or chalk used to whiten the tongue. Redness of skin, caused by friction with a hard brush.	This deceit is generally developed by an examination of a day or two. Where flour or chalk has been used to whiten the tongue, the line of demarcation between the whitened part and the clean, healthy margin of the tongue, is too well marked to escape observation.
Fistula in Ano.	By making an incision near the verge of the anus, and introducing into it an acrid tent, such as the root of white hellebore.	By careful examination.
Fractures.	There is generally nothing but the man's own testimony. He complains of pain in the part; if fracture of the skull be feigned, he states, perhaps, that he becomes deranged on tasting liquor.	By attentive examination.
Hæmatemesis.	By drinking the blood of some animal, or using some colored liquid, and then throwing it up.	By cutting off the supply of the fluid and careful examination.
Hæmoptysis.	By secreting bullock's blood for the purpose of coloring the saliva; making small incisions in the mouth; using bole armeniac or paint of vermilion.	Blood from the lungs is frothy and light-colored. Mouth and fauces must be carefully inspected, and the individual be observed.
Hæmorrhoids.	By introducing bladders of rats or of small fish partly into the rectum. The linen has also been stained with borrowed blood.	The means are obvious.
Heart, Diseases of, see Palpitation.
Hepatitis.	.....	Unless the person be a well educated impostor, acute inflammation of the liver will be detected by the absence of marks of strong inflammatory action. Chronic liver disease is, frequently, not characterized by well-marked symptoms, and hence, when assumed, is difficult of detection.
Hernia.	In the same manner as hydrocele; — by inflation.	The detection is easy.
Hydrocele.	By puncturing the skin of the scrotum, and inflating the cellular membrane.	Do.
Hydrocephalus.	By opening the integuments of the head near the vertex, e. g. and blowing in air.	Do.
Hysteria.	.....	Does not easily resist the application of strong sternutatories to the nostrils. Attentive examination necessary.
Insanity.	.....	The expression of countenance cannot easily be feigned. Nor can the affection be kept up so long as in real mental alienation. The individual cannot do so long without food, sleep, &c.
Jaundice.	By coloring the skin with an infusion of turmeric or tincture of rhubarb. Clay-colored stools produced by taking daily a small quantity of muriatic acid. High-colored urine by rhubarb taken internally.	The eyes cannot be colored, although smoke has been used for this purpose. The skin must be washed to remove the coloring matter, if any exist, and the supply of acid and rhubarb be prevented.
Lameness.	By keeping the limb in a contracted state, and resisting any efforts to move it.	By two persons taking hold of the individual and moving rapidly along with him; and when they are tired having relays. The impostor will generally give in. By anæsthetics, as under Aphonia.
Menstruation.	By staining the clothes and body with borrowed blood.	By cutting off the supply.
Myopia.	.....	Present an open book, and apply the leaves close to the nose. If it cannot be read distinctly, when thus placed, or when glasses proper for short-sightedness are used, the disease is feigned.
Ophthalmia.	Excited by a variety of acrid and corrosive substances applied to the eye; as lime, &c. A portion of black muslin, spread over the cornea. The eyelashes are sometimes extracted, and caustic applied to excite disease in the palpebræ.	When ophthalmia is thus excited, its progress is ordinarily very rapid, arriving at its height within a few hours.
Ozæna.	By impregnating a piece of sponge with some offensive juices or oils, mixed with decayed cheese, and putting the imbued sponge into the nostrils.

Diseases, &c.	How Feigned.	How Detected.
Pains.	.....	The detection is here often difficult. The non-existence of pain cannot be proved, and great pain may be present without any appearance externally. The imposition is more frequently detected by inconsistencies and contradictions in the patient's history of the case, than in any other manner.
Palpitation.	White hellebore, given in the dose of 10 or 12 grains, and repeated, will occasion general indisposition, and undue action of the heart.	Cut off the supply.
Shaking Palsy.	.....	May be suspected, if the person be in an ordinary state of vigor. Use violent remedies and means, recommended under Chorea.
Paralysis.	.....	Violent remedies are here required. Cold affusion, actual cautery, electric shocks, &c. By anæsthetics, as under Aphonia.
Phthisis Pulmonalis.	Individuals with long necks and contracted shoulders have simulated phthisis, by covering the chest with blisters, cicatrices of issues, &c., and by taking drugs which cause paleness.	By attentive examination of the symptoms.
Polypus Nasi.	By introducing the testicle of a young cock, or the kidney of a rabbit, into the nostril, and retaining it there by means of a sponge fastened to it.
Porrigo or Scalled Head.	By applying nitric acid to the head, after protecting the face with fatty substances; but the chronic state is imitated by the use of depilatories of different kinds applied sometimes in patches, so as to resemble Porrigo decalvans.
Pregnancy.	By wearing pads, and assuming the longing after particular articles of diet, &c.	By the absence of the areola; the presence of a pad; and, if necessary, by examination per vaginam.
Prolapsus Ani.	By a portion of the intestine of the ox, in which a sponge filled with a mixture of blood and milk is placed.
Prolapsus Uteri.	By a similar fraud.
Pulse, Weakness or Defect of.	By ligatures applied to the corresponding arm. Slowness of pulse may be caused by the use of Veratrum viride.	By examining whether the arteries of the two arms beat alike; and if a ligature be placed on the arm.
Rheumatism, Chronic.	By complaining of great suffering on moving the limbs, and of pain and stiffness of the joints.	By careful observation, and the use of anæsthetics, as under Aphonia. It is frequently feigned, and not easy of detection. See Pains.
Scrofula.	By exciting ulcers below the angles of the jaw.	By examining the general habit, and observing whether the ulcerations be glandular, and the discharge of a scrofulous character.
Scurvy.	By covering the teeth with wax, and then applying acid corrosive substances to the gums.	By examining the general habit; whether debilitated, cachectic, and possessing the usual general signs of scorbutus.
Stammering.	.....	Simulators of this defect generally state that it is connate, or ascribe it to a fit of apoplexy or severe fever. Where the organs of speech were perfect, and the moral evidence of the previous existence of the infirmity was not satisfactory, the French authorities used to confine the soldiers, and not supply them with food until they called for it without stammering.
Strabismus.	.....	If the person be roused suddenly from sleep, the eyes will be right, as they also are during sleep. Under anæsthetics they would be so likewise.
Stricture of the Urethra.	.....	By passing a bougie.
Swelling of the Legs.	By ligatures round the thighs.	Examine the limbs uncovered.
Syncope.	Ligatures are sometimes used to prevent the pulse being felt. By applying lotions to the face to make it pale.	By using sternutatories. By the absence of some of the symptoms of syncope. Examine the naked arms. Wash the face.
Tuberculosis, see Phthisis.
Tympany.	Persons have possessed the power of swallowing air, so as to distend the stomach, and simulate tympany.
Ulcer of the Ear.	By introducing a tent, imbued with blistering plaster, into the ear, and repeating the application until the tube becomes ulcerated, and a discharge of puriform matter is established. The fetid smell is imitated by dropping into the ear a	By careful examination.

Diseases, &c.	How Feigned.	How Detected.
Ulcer of the Ear (continued).	mixture of empyreumatic oil, asafœtida, and old cheese. Also, by introducing a little honey into the meatus.
Ulcers of the Legs, &c.	By corrosives or irritants. Sometimes by abrasion, by rubbing sand on the shin-bone. At others they are pretended, by gluing on a piece of spleen or the skin of a frog.	Artificial ulcers have, usually, a more distinct margin, and are more readily healed than others; the latter being generally indicative of an impaired constitution.
Urine, Bloody.	The fruit of the Indian fig (Cactus opuntia) colors the urine as red as blood. Cantharides will cause it. Blood may also be procured and mixed with the urine.	By making the patient pass his urine in the presence of the physician, and examining the vessel before and after. By cutting off the supply of any substance which could cause the appearance.
Urine, Incontinence of.	.....	Difficult, at times, of detection. Give the person a full dose of opium, and introduce the catheter when he is asleep. If there be urine, the incontinence is feigned.
Varicose Veins.	By a ligature placed tightly round the limb. They may be excited in this manner, or aggravated if already existing.	By examining the limb.

Fer'ri Protocarbo'nas, Protocar'bonate of Iron, Fer'rous Car'bonate, (F.) Carbonate de Fer. The protocarbonate of iron, thrown down from a solution of the sulphate of iron by the carbonate of soda, readily attracts oxygen and becomes converted into the sesquioxide. To prevent this, it may be associated with honey and sugar, and the mixture be reduced by evaporation to a pilular consistence. The mass constitutes the Ferrug''inous Pills, Pilules ferrugineuses, of Vallet, Vallet's Pills. See Pilulæ Ferri Carbonatis. The Edinburgh Pharmacopœia contained the Ferri Carbo'nas Sacchara'tum, Ferri Carbo'nas cum Sac'charo, Sac'charine Car'bonate of Iron, prepared in this manner. It is the Ferrum Carbo'nicum Sacchara'tum of Klauer, the Ferri Carbo'nas Sacchara'ta, Sac'charated Car'bonate of Iron of the Ph. B. (1867). It is made by heating phosphate of sodium to watery fusion, drying, heating to incipient redness without fusion, dissolving this in water with the aid of heat, filtering and cooling, and adding solution of tersulphate of iron, until this ceases to produce a precipitate. Stir and strain, and then wash the precipitate, after draining it, until the washings pass nearly tasteless, and transfer to a weighed porcelain capsule, to which add a saturated solution of citric acid in water of ammonia, and evaporate, and obtain the salt, by drying, in scales. On account of its solubility, it is a favorite ingredient in the preparation of elixirs of iron, &c. Dose, two to five grains.

Dissolve the sulphate of iron and carbonate of soda severally in four pints of the water, then mix the solutions, and set it by, that the powder may subside; pour off the liquor, wash the subcarbonate with water until the washings pass nearly tasteless, and dry on bibulous paper without heat. It has, also, been called Ferri sesquiox'idum, Ox'idum ferri fus'cum, O. ferri ru'brum, Deutocarbo'nas ferri fuscus, Cro'cus mar'tis ape'riens, Sesquioxide or peroxide of iron, (F.) Peroxide de fer, Safran de Mars apéritif.

Fer'rum Oxyda'tum Hydra'tum, Fer'ri Ox'idum Hydra'tum (Ph. U. S.) seu Perox'idum Hu'midum (Ph. B., 1867), seu Perox'idum Hydra'tum, Ferru'go, Hy'dras Fer'ricus, Fer'ric hy'drate, Hydroöxide of Iron, Hydra'ted oxide or perox'ide of Iron, Hydra'ted Tritox'ide of Iron, Moist Peroxide of Iron. It may be prepared by taking a solution of sulphate of iron, increasing its dose of oxygen by heating it with nitric acid, and precipitating the oxide by adding pure ammonia in excess, washing the precipitate, and keeping it moist.

In the Ph. U.S., 1873, it is directed to be prepared by adding water of ammonia to a solution of tersulphate of iron; washing the precipitate until the washings pass nearly tasteless. It is then mixed with water and transferred to a wide-mouthed bottle, which must be kept well-stopped.

The Ph. U. S. also directs that when the hydrated oxide of iron is to be made in haste for use as an antidote, the washing may be performed more quickly by forcibly pressing the strainer with the hands, and mixing the precipitate with sufficient water to measure Oiss. In the French Codex (1866), Peroxyde de Fer Hydraté is made by the action of ammonia on solution of perchloride of iron.

It has been recommended as an antidote to arsenic; and many cases of its efficacy have been published. From 10 to 20 parts of the hydrated oxide would seem to be more than sufficient to convert 1 part of arsenious acid into the basic salt of iron.

The Ph. B., 1867, has a Fer'ri Perox'idum Hydra'tum, prepared by drying the moist peroxide at a temperature not exceeding 212°.

U. S., 1873.) It is one of the mildest of the salts of iron, and not unpalatable. Dose, gr. x. to ʒss.

The Tinctu'ra Mar'tis Aperitiva, Tinc'ture of Lud'wig, Al'cohol cum Sulpha'tē Fer'ri tartarisa'tus, Tinctu'ra Mar'tis Glaube'ri is, essentially, a solution of this salt. Eau de Boule, a solution of the salt in water, is used in contusions. The Tinctu'ra Mar'tis Tartariza'ta, (F.) Teinture de Mars Tartarisée of the French Codex (1866), is prepared by the action of alcohol and water on iron filings and cream of tartar.

The Boules de Molshcim are prepared by adding to five parts of the Boules de Mars one part of benzoin and as much turpentine.

Helve'tius's Styp'tic was composed of the filings of iron and tartar, mixed to a proper consistence with French brandy. It was called in England Eat'on's Styp'tic; but this is now formed of Sulphate of Iron.

Fe'ver, Fe'bris, (feritas, 'wildness,' or from fervor, 'heat,' or from februo, 'I purify,') Pyr, Pyr'etus, (F.) Fièvre. One of the most frequent and dangerous affections to which the body is liable. A person has an attack of fever, when he is affected with rigors, followed by increased heat of skin, quick pulse, languor, and lassitude. Rigors, increased heat, and frequency of pulse have each been assumed as the essential character of fever. It is not characterized, however, by any one, but depends upon the coëxistence of many symptoms. Fevers have been usually divided into the idiopath'ic or essent''ial, and the symptomat'ic. The idiopathic arise without any obvious local cause. The symptomatic are dependent upon local irritation. Idiopathic fevers may be divided into three classes — 1. Those attended with distinct paroxysms — intermittents. 2. Remittent and continued fevers: and, 3. Fevers complicated with eruptions—the exanthematous. These divisions admit of great variety, owing to climate, season, soil, age, &c. All ages and climates are liable to fever; and its exciting causes, are very numerous. These causes may be common, as irritations in the intestines, external injuries, stimulants, &c.; or they may be specific, as miasmata, contagion, &c. The greatest diversity has prevailed regarding the theory of fever. Its primary seat has been placed in the brain, mucous membrane of the stomach and intestines, skin, nerves, bloodvessels, liver, vena cava, pancreas, &c. It would seem, however, that although, in fever, the whole of the functions are morbidly impressed, the arguments in favor of the impression being first made on the nervous system and the system of nutrition are the strongest. The exciting cause of fever, whatever it may be, produces an irregular action in the system of nutrition, which is soon conveyed to the rest of the system, owing to the extensive sympathy which exists between every part of the body; and it is probable, that all those local inflammations and congestions are the consequence, rather than the cause, of this disordered condition of the system. The general character of fever is clearly shown by examination of the blood. When fever is devoid of inflammatory complication, the quantity of fibrin is in no case augmented. It frequently remains in the healthy proportion, and at times diminishes to an extent not met with in any other acute disease. The alteration of the blood in fevers, which consists generally in a diminution of the fibrinous element, is the reverse of what occurs in inflammation.

Many phenomena of fever are influenced by that periodic''ity, which we notice in the exercise of several of the functions of the body. The types of intermittents are strong evidences of such an influence.

In the treatment of fever, it is important to bear in mind — 1. Its tendency, particularly in the case of the exanthemata, to run a definite course, and terminate in restoration to health. 2. The disposition to local determination or hyperæmia — the most frequent cause of the fatal termination of fever — a circumstance requiring the vigilant attention of the physician. 3. That the symptoms must be attentively studied, in order to deduce, as far as possible from them, the indications of cure. Lastly, attention must be paid to the prevalent epidemic. There are particular seasons in which fevers are very malignant; and others in which they are as mild; circumstances which necessarily have an effect upon the treatment.

Sauvages, Cullen, and others regard it as a variety of typhus: and Pinel, as a species of gastroadynamic or bilious putrid fever. It occurs, endemically, annually within the tropics; but is met with epidemically in the temperate regions. Broussais regards the disease as gastroenteritis, exasperated by atmospheric heat; so that it runs through its stages with much greater rapidity than the gastroenteritis of our climates. The yellow color of the skin, according to him, is owing to the inflammation of the small intestine,—and especially of the duodenum, — augmenting the secretion of the liver, and at the same time preventing its discharge into the duodenum. The pathology of this affection, as well as its origin, is still unsettled. The treatment must generally be of the most active nature at the onset; consisting in bleeding largely, and exhibiting mercury, so as to excite a new action, if possible; — the other symptoms being combated according to general principles. It must vary, however, according to the epidemic.

Fi'bre, Fi'bra, Is, Cte'don, Fi'lum. An organic filament, of a solid consistence, and more or less extensible, which enters into the composition of every animal and vegetable texture. The simple or elementary fibre of the ancients, from a particular assemblage and arrangement of which every texture of the body was conceived to be constituted, is entirely ideal. The moderns usually admit, with Haller and Blumenbach, three elementary fibres or tissues. 1. The cellular or areolar, formed chiefly of thin plates, of a whitish color, and extensible, which seems to consist of concrete gelatin. 2. The nervous, pulpy, or med'ullary, formed of a soft substance, contained in a cellular sheath, and consisting of albumen united to a fatty matter. 3. The muscular, composed of round filaments, of a grayish or reddish color, and formed of fibrin. Chaussier has added to these the albugineous fibre, but it seems to differ from the cellular fibre only in greater condensation of the molecules. See Fibrous.

It enters into the composition of the chyle and the blood; is the self-coagulable material in them, and is produced in the retrograde metamorphosis of the tissues. It is in small proportion in the blood; but its cipher increases in inflammation, while in continued fever it is diminished. Mus'cular fibrin, Syn'tonin, Mus'culin, has been shown to be different from that of the blood. It is, indeed, by its chemical character, a peculiar substance, and has also been called mus'cular sub'stance. In certain diseased actions, Fibrin or Coag'ulable lymph, Glu'ten, is separated from the blood, and is found in considerable quantity on the surfaces of membranes, and in the cavities of the body. See Liquor sanguinis, and Fibrinogen.

Fibrin is likewise a proximate principle of vegetables, and differs but little in chemical composition from animal fibrin; nor does it differ much from albumen and casein. It is very nutritious.

Fibrina'tion, Fibrina'tio. The act of adding fibrin to the blood. The opposite to defibrina'tion.

Fibrin'ogen. (A hybrid term, from fibrin, and γενω or γεναω, 'I engender,') Fibrinog"enous Sub'stance, (F.) Plasmin. According to the researches of Dr. Buchanan and Dr. A. Schmidt, fibrin has no existence in a liquid state, but is produced as a solid matter in a fluid by the union of two substances already present in solution, called fibrin'ogen or fibrinog"enous sub'stance, and fibrinoplas'tin or fibrinoplas'tic sub'stance.

Fibrocartilages are distinguished into — 1. Mem'braniform, or those which serve as moulds to certain parts, as the alæ nasi and eyelids. 2. Vag"iniform, or those which form sheaths for the sliding of tendons. 3. Interartic'ular, those which are met with in the movable articulations. 4. Uni'ting, (F.) Fibrocartilages d'union, which form a junction between two bones, as the symphysis pubis. Fibrocartilages are sometimes formed adventitiously, as the result of a morbid process in different organs. Circumferen'tial fibrocar'tilages consist of a rim of fibrocartilage surrounding the margin of some of the articular cavities, as the glenoid cavity of the shoulder. They serve to deepen the articular surface and to protect the bones.

Fibrocar'tilages, Tar'sal, see Tarsus.

Fi'brous, Fibro'sus, Fi'broid, (F.) Fibreux. Composed of fibres. Certain membranes, as the dura mater, periosteum, ligamentous capsules of the joints, &c., are fibrous. The fibrous system of Bichat includes the system of organs formed by the albugineous fibre of Chaussier. It comprises, particularly, the periosteum and perichondrium; the articular capsules and ligaments; the tendons; the dura mater, pericardium, tunica sclerotica, tunica albuginea testis, outer membrane of the spleen, &c. Under simple fibrous tissues, Te'læ fibro'sæ, certain writers have classed the white and yellow fibrous tissues, and areolar tissue. Both the yellow and the white may be detected in the areolar tissue. The white is said to exist alone in ligaments, tendons, fibrous membranes, aponeuroses, &c. The yellow, (F.) Tissu jaune, exists separately in the middle coat of the arteries, the chordæ vocales, ligamentum nuchæ of quadrupeds, &c. It differs from the white in possessing a high degree of elasticity, owing to the presence of a distinct principle, called, by MM. Robin and Verdeil, Élasticine.

Fis'tula, ('a pipe or reed,') Syr'inx, Syrin'ga, Aul'us, Fis'tule: when of a small size, Aulis'cus. A solution of continuity, of greater or less depth and sinuosity; the opening of which is narrow, and the disease kept up by an altered texture of parts, so that it is not disposed to heal. A fistula may be cutaneous or deepseated. It is incomplete or blind, when it has but one opening; and complete when there are two, the one communicating with an internal cavity, the other externally. It is lined in its whole course by a membrane which seems analogous to mucous membranes. Incomplete fistulæ may be internal or external. The former are those which open internally; the latter those which open externally. External incomplete fistulæ are kept up by caries or necrosis of bones, by extraneous bodies in any of the living textures, or by purulent cavities, the walls of which have not become united. Internal incomplete fistulæ generally soon become complete, since the discharge that escapes from them into the cavities into which they open has a constant tendency to make its way outwardly, and soon occasions ulceration of the integuments. Fistulæ have received different names, according to the discharge which they afford, and the organs in which they are seated, — as lachrymal, biliary, salivary, synovial, and urinary — Fis'tula uri'næ seu urina'lis, U'rias. The great object of treatment in fistulous sores is to bring on an altered condition of the parietes of the canal, by astringent or stimulating injections, caustics, the knife, pressure, &c. Those which are dependent on diseased bone, cartilage, tendon, &c., do not heal until after the exfoliation of the morbid part. Fistulæ of excretory ducts are produced either by an injury of the duct itself or by the retention and accumulation of the fluids to which they have to give passage. Thus, Fis'tula lacryma'lis, Dacryosyr'inx, Emphrag'ma lacryma'lē, Hy'drops sac'ci lacryma'lis, Drop'sy of the lach'rymal sac, commonly proceeds from the obliteration of the nasal ducts, or from atony of the lachrymal sac; preventing the tears from passing into the nostrils.

Fis'tula, Aë'rial. An opening resulting from injury to the larynx and trachea, which allows the air of respiration to pass through.

Fis'tula in A'no, A'nal fistula, Archosyr'inx, generally occurs from some mechanical pressure or impediment. The principal indication in the treatment of these fistulæ of the excretory canals being to put a stop to the constant discharge of the secretions, &c., through the preternatural channel, the fistulous passage is at times laid open, and a communication established with the natural excretory canal; at others, strong pressure is employed to procure its obliteration.

It is a thick, flat muscle, seated at the anterior part of the forearm. Its upper extremity, which is simple, arises from the internal condyle of the os humeri; — from the coronoid process of the ulna, and from the anterior edge of the radius. Its lower extremity divides into four tendons, which slide under the anterior annular ligament of the carpus, and are inserted into the second phalanges of the last four fingers, after having been slit to allow the tendons of the flexor profundus to pass through them. This muscle bends the second phalanges on the first; these on the carpal bones, and the hand on the forearm.

Fœ'tal, Fœta'lis. Relating to the fœtus. A name given to the parts connected with the fœtus. Thus we say — the fœtal surface of the placenta, in contradistinction to the uterine or maternal surface.

Fœ'tal Circula'tion differs from that of the adult in several respects. Commencing with the placenta, where it probably undergoes some change analogous to what occurs in the lungs in extra-uterine existence, the blood proceeds by the umbilical vein as far as the liver, where a part of it is poured into the vena porta; the other proceeds into the vena cava inferior; the latter, having received the suprahepatic veins, pours its blood into the right auricle. From the right auricle, a part of the blood is sent into the right ventricle; the rest passes directly through into the left auricle, by the foramen ovale. When the right ventricle contracts, the blood is sent into the pulmonary artery, but as the function of respiration is not going on, little blood passes to the lungs; the rest goes through the ductus arteriosus into the aorta. The blood, received by the left auricle from the lungs, as well as that which passed through the foramen ovale, is transmitted into the left ventricle, by the contraction of which it is sent into the aorta, and by means of the umbilical arteries, which arise from the hypogastric, it is returned to the placenta.

Fœ'tus, gen. Fœ'tûs, Fe'tus, Cye'ma, O'nus ven'tris, Sar'cina. The young of any creature. The unborn child. (F.) Fétus, Faix, Fruit. By κυημα, Cye'ma, Hippocrates meant the fecundated, but still imperfect germ. It corresponded with the term embryo, as now used; while εμβρυον, 'embryo,' signified the fœtus at a more advanced stage of uterogestation. The majority of anatomists apply to the germ the name embryo, which it retains until the third month of gestation, and with some until the period of quickening; while fœtus is applied to it in its latter stages. The terms are, however, often used indiscriminately. When the ovule has been fecundated in the ovarium, it proceeds slowly towards, and enters the uterus, with which it becomes ultimately connected by means of the placenta. When first seen, the fœtus has the form of a gelatinous flake, which some have compared to an ant, a grain of barley, a worm curved upon itself, &c. The fœtal increment is very rapid in the first, third, fourth, and sixth months of its formation, and at the end of nine months it has attained its full dimensions — Enfant à terme. Generally, there is but one fœtus in utero; sometimes, there are two; rarely three. The fœtus presents considerable difference in its shape, weight, length, situation in the womb, proportion of its various parts to each other, arrangement and texture of its organs, state of its functions at different periods of gestation, &c. All these differences are important in an obstetrical and medico-legal point of view.

The treatment of fractures consists, in general, in reducing the fragments when displaced; maintaining them when reduced; preventing the symptoms which may be likely to arise; and combating them when they occur. The reduction of fractures must be effected by extension, counter-extension, and coaptation. The parts are kept in apposition by position, rest, and an appropriate apparatus. The position must vary according to the kind of fracture. Commonly, the fractured limb is placed on a horizontal or slightly inclined plane, in a state of extension; or rather in a middle state between extension and flexion, according to the case. (The various methods adapted to the treatment of special forms of fracture will be found described in systematic treatises on Surgery or Fractures.)

A term applied to a fracture of the lower extremity of the radius, which commences at the articular surface, and extends upwards for an inch or more, to terminate on the dorsal aspect. Owing to the extensor muscles drawing up the separated portion of the bone, and with it the carpus, a deformity results, which has been confounded with simple dislocation. In consequence of the fracture having been well described by Dr. John Rhea Barton, of Philadelphia, it is often called after him.

The Pian, for so the Indians call it, differs somewhat in America and Africa.

Pi'an of Amer'ica, Framboe'sia America'na, Anthra'cia Ru'bula Americana, occurs under similar circumstances with the next, and seems to be transmitted by copulation. The tumors have a similar form, and are greater in proportion to their paucity. In some cases they are mixed with ulcers.

Pi'an of Guin'ea, Framboe'sia Guineen'sis, Anthra'cia Ru'bula Guineen'sis, is common among the negroes, especially in childhood and youth. It begins by small spots, which appear on different parts, and especially on the organs of generation and around the anus; these spots disappear, and are transformed into an eschar, to which an excrescence succeeds, that grows slowly, and has the shape above described.

The treatment is nearly the same in the two varieties. The tumors, when small, will yield to mercurial friction. When large, they must be destroyed by caustic. In both cases, mercury must be given to prevent a recurrence.

An endemic disease resembling yaws was observed in the Fecjee Islands by the medical officers of the United States' Exploring Expedition. It is called by the natives Dthoke.

It forms the vault of the orbit; lodges the ethmoid bone in a notch at its middle part; and is articulated, besides, with the sphenoid, parietal, and nasal bones, the ossa unguis, superior maxillary, and malar bones.

Fron'tal Fur'row extends upwards from the frontal spine, and becomes gradually larger in its course, to lodge the upper part of the superior longitudinal sinus, and to give attachment to the falx cerebri.

Fron'tal Nerve, Palpébro-frontal (Ch.), is the greatest of the three branches of the ophthalmic nerve — the first division of the fifth pair. It proceeds along the superior paries of the orbit, and divides into two branches: the one internal, which makes its exit from the orbitar fossa, passing beneath the pulley of the oblique muscle; the other, external, issuing from the same cavity by the foramen orbitarium superius.

The effects of fruits on the body, in a medical as well as a dietetical point of view, are various. They may be distinguished into classes; for while the Cerea'lia, for example, afford fruits which are highly nutritious, the Summer Fruits (Fruc'tus Horæ'i), which include strawberries, cherries, currants, mulberries, raspberries, figs, grapes, &c., are refrigerant and grateful, but afford little nourishment.

Func'tion, Func'tio, Ac'tio, (F.) Fonction; (fungor, functus, 'I act,' 'I perform.') The action of an organ or set of organs. Any act, necessary for accomplishing a vital phenomenon. A function is a special office in the animal economy, which has, as its instrument, an organ or apparatus of organs. Thus respiration is a function. Its object is the conversion of venous into arterial blood, and its instrument is the lungs. The ancient physiologists divided the functions into vi'tal, an'imal, and nat'ural. They called vital functions those which are essential to life, as innervation, circulation, respiration; animal functions, those which belong to the encephalon; viz., the functions of the intellect, the affections of the mind, and the voluntary motions; and natural functions, Faculta'tes seu Actio'nes natura'les, those relating to assimilation, such as the actions of the abdominal viscera, of the absorbent and exhalant vessels, &c. Bichat divided the functions into those which relate to the preservation of the individual, and those that relate to the preservation of the species. The former he subdivided into animal and organic. The animal functions or functions of relation are those of the intellect, sensation, locomotion, and voice. The organic functions include digestion, absorption, respiration, circulation, secretion, nutrition, and calorification. The functions, whose object is the preservation of the species—the organic, nutritive, or vegetative functions — are all those that relate to generation; — such as conception, gestation, accouchement, &c. Each of these admits of numerous subdivisions in a complete course of Physiology;—for so the doctrine of the functions is called.

Func'tional Disea'ses, see Organic diseases.

Func'tional or Vi'tal Phenom'ena are those produced by some modification in the action of an organ or organs, in contradistinction to those of a material or physical character; — thus we distinguish the functional phenomena of phthisis from those indicated by physical diagnosis — the physical phenomena.

Robin: — Trichoph'yton tonsu'rans, on the hairy scalp; T. sporuloïdes, on ulcers; Micros'porum Audoui'ni, in the hair follicles; M. meutagroph'ytes, at the roots of the hair; M. furfur, in the skin; Mucor muce'do, in a cavity of gangrene of the lung; Acho'rion Schönlein'i, in the hairy scalp and hair follicles; Aspergil'li species [?], in the meatus auditorius externus; Puccin'ia fa'vi, in favus; Oï'dium al'bicans, in aphthæ; and Champignon du poumon, in the lung.

In Pathology, Fungus is commonly used synonymously with fungosity, myco'sis. M. Breschet has proposed to restrict the term fungos'ity to vegetations which arise on denuded surfaces, and to apply the term fungus to the tumors which form in the substance of the textures, without any external ulceration. Fici and warts, for example, would be fungi of the skin.

(After Galvani.) A series of phenomena, consisting in sensible movements, executed by animal parts, which are endowed with irritability, when placed in connection with two metallic plates of different nature, between which a communication is established by direct contact or by means of a metallic wire. Galvanism has been employed medicinally in the same cases as electricity, and especially in neuralgic affections. It has been applied in the form of plates—'Mans'ford's plates.' In asthma, for example, a small blister, the size of a dollar, may be placed on the neck over the course of the phrenic and pneumogastric nerves, and another on the side, in the region of the diaphragm. One metal is placed mediately or immediately over the vesicated surface on the neck, and another over that in the side. They are then connected by means of a wire. The new nervous impression, in this way induced, is often signally beneficial.

Galvan'ic chains have been devised for the same purpose. One of these, called, after its inventor, 'Pulvermacher's Hydroelec'tric Chain Bat'tery,' is a modification of the voltaic pile, capable of being employed topically.

Gan'glion, (γαγγλιον, 'a knot,') Gan'glium. In anatomy, a name generally given to a knot-like enlargement in the course of a nerve. It is applied, however, to organs differing considerably from each other in size, color, texture, functions, &c. They are divided into gland'iform, lymphat'ic, and ner'vous. 1. Gland'iform gan'glions, called also ad'enoid, vas'cular, and sanguin'eous gan'glions; blind, apor'ic, duct'less, blood, and vas'cular glands,—gland'ulæ vasculo'sæ, gland'ulæ spu'riæ, &c., are organs of whose functions we are, in general, ignorant; and which have the appearance of glands. They are formed of agglomerated globules, pervaded by bloodvessels surrounded by areolar membrane, and contain a milky or yellowish fluid. To this class belong the spleen, thymus, thyroid, and suprarenal glands. They are, doubtless, concerned in sanguification. 2. Lymphat'ic gan'glions. See Conglobate. 3. Ner'vous gan'glions, Gan'glia seu Ganglio'nes seu No'di seu Nod'uli Nervo'rum, Tumo'res seu Plex'us ganglioform'es, Plex'us glandifor'mes, Tuber'cula nodo'sa Nervo'rum, Divertic'ula spirit'uum anima'lium, Gan'glia of in'crease, Form'ative gan'glia. Enlargements or knots in the course of a nerve. They belong, in general, to the system of the great sympathetic. One exists on the posterior root of every spinal nerve, and on one cerebral—the 5th. Bichat regarded them as so many small brains, or centres of nervous action, independent of the encephalon, and intended exclusively for organic life. Being formed by the union of the cerebral and spinal nerves, they may send out the influence of both these nervous centres to the parts to which the nerves proceeding from them are distributed. Ganglia are chiefly composed of vesicular neurine; and appear to be concerned in the formation and dispensation of nerve power.

Gan'glion, Emphy'ma encys'tis gan'glion. A globular, hard, indolent tumor, without change in the color of the skin; of a size varying from that of a pea to that of an egg, and always situate in the course of a tendon. The tumor is formed of a viscid, albuminous fluid, contained in a cyst of greater or less thickness. The cyst is sometimes loose; but in the majority of cases it communicates, by a narrow footstalk, with the sheath of a tendon, or even with the synovial capsule of a neighboring articulation. The causes are generally unknown. The treatment consists in compression, percussion, the use of discutients, extirpation, or incision.

Gan'grene, Gangræ'na, Cancre'na, Hot mortifica'tion, (F.) Gangrène, G. Chaude, Asphyxie des parties. Privation of life or partial death of an organ. Authors have generally distinguished mortification into two stages; naming the first incip'ient mortifica'tion or gan'grene. It is attended with a sudden diminution of feeling in the part affected; livid discoloration; detachment of the cuticle, under which a turbid fluid is effused; with crepitation, owing to the disengagement of air into the areolar texture. When the part has become quite black, and incapable of all feeling, circulation, and life, it constitutes the second stage, or mortifica'tion, and is called sphac''elus. Gangrene, however, is frequently used synonymously with mortification,—lo'cal asphyx'ia being the term employed for that condition in which the parts are in a state of suspended animation, and, consequently, susceptible of resuscitation. When the part is filled with fluid entering into putrefaction, the affection is called hu'mid gan'grene, (F.) Gangrène humide: on the other hand, when it is dry and shrivelled, it constitutes dry gan'grene, Mummifica'tion, (F.) Gangrène sèche. To this class belongs the gangræ'na seni'lis, G. Pott'tii, Presbysphac''elus, Se'nile gan'grene, or sponta'neous gangrene of old people, which rarely admits of cure. Whatever may be the kind of gangrene, it may be caused by violent inflammation, external injury—Traumat'ic gangrene—contusion, a burn, congelation, the ligature of a large arterial trunk, mechanical obstruction to the return of blood—Stat'ic gangrene—or by some inappreciable internal cause.

The treatment, both of external and internal gangrene, varies according to the causes which produce it. Gangrene from excessive inflammation is obviated by antiphlogistics; and that from intense cold by cautiously restoring the circulation by cold frictions, &c. When the gangrene has become developed, the separation of the eschars must be encouraged by emollient applications, if there be considerable reaction; or by tonics and stimulants, if the reaction be insufficient.

Gas, Gaz, (Sax. ȝarτ, (G.) Geist, 'spirit, [?]) Air. Van Helmont first designated by this name — the etymology of which is not certain — the carbonic acid developed in the vinous fermentation. Afterwards, the term was appropriated to every permanently elastic fluid; that is, which preserves its aëriform state at all temperatures; and ultimately it was extended to all aëriform bodies, which were divided into permanent and non-permanent gases. The latter are generally termed vapors; they return to the liquid state, when a portion of their caloric is abstracted. The permanent gases, or gazes properly so called, are numerous, and may be divided into three sections with regard to their effects on the animal economy.

1. Irrespirable gases.	Ammoniacal gas, chlorohydric acid gas, deutoxide of nitrogen, nitrous acid gas, and chlorine.
2. Negatively deleterious gases.	Hydrogen, nitrogen, carbonic acid.
3. Positively deleterious gases.	Oxygen, protoxide of nitrogen, carburetted hydrogen, carbonic oxide, sulphuretted hydrogen, and arseniuretted hydrogen.

It is proper to remark that the term respirable has been very differently employed by different writers. Sometimes it has meant the power of supporting life when applied to the blood in the lungs. At others, all gases have been deemed irrespirable which are incapable of being introduced into the lungs by voluntary efforts,—without any relation to their power of maintaining vitality; and this is perhaps the best sense. The gases were at one time employed in medicine under great expectations, especially by the enthusiastic Beddoes; but they are now scarcely ever had recourse to. That such a fluid is secreted, which concurs powerfully in digestion, is evident from many considerations, and has been positively proved by the author and numerous others. It was found by him to contain, in man, chlorohydric and acetic acids, which are associated with a ferment, pep'sin. The gastric fluid in cases of sudden death sometimes corrodes and perforates the stomach; giving rise to interesting questions in medical jurisprudence.

nac, Gastrite, Catarrhe gastrique. A disease, characterized by pyrexia; great anxiety; heat and pain in the epigastrium, increased by taking any thing into the stomach; vomiting and hiccough. Gastritis may either be seated in the peritoneal or mucous coat. It is most frequently in the latter—Esogastri'tis, Endogastri'tis, Gastromycoderi'tis, Gastri'tis mucosa—being excited directly by acrid ingesta. It requires the most active treatment;—bleeding, blistering, fomentations, diluents, &c. Some degree of inflammation of the mucous coat of the stomach was considered by the followers of Broussais to be present in almost all fevers; and the various forms of dyspepsia have been supposed by some to be nothing more than chron'ic endogastri'tis. Gastric Catarrh, a common form of gastritis, marked by active congestion of the organ, with excessive secretion of mucus, is usually produced by excess in eating or drinking. The French describe under Gastrite, Catarrhe gastrique ou *Gastrite Catarrhale, G. These muscles are distinguished into internal and external, which are distinct above, but united at their inferior extremity. They are long, flat, and thick; and arise — the former from the posterior part of the outer condyle of the femur; the latter, from the posterior part of the inner condyle of the same bone. The aponeurosis, which unites these muscles below, joins with that of the Solaris, and forms with it a large tendon, which, under the name Ten'do Achil'lis, is inserted at the posterior part of the calcaneum. These muscles extend the foot on the leg, and the leg on the foot. They can, also, bend the leg and the thigh reciprocally on each other. Gel'ly, Jel'ly, Jus gela'tum seu coagula'tum, Gel'u, (F.) Gelée, (from gelare, 'to congeal.') A substance of a soft consistence, tremulous, and transparent, which is obtained by an appropriate treatment from animal or vegetable matters; hence the distinction into animal and vegetable jelly. The former is merely a concentrated solution of gelatin, left to cool. Several gelées are officinal in the French Codex (1866).

Veg''etable Jel'ly is found in the juice of the currant, mulberry, and of almost all acid fruits, when ripe. It is of itself colorless, but almost always retains a little coloring matter of the fruit which has furnished it. It has an agreeable taste; is scarcely soluble in cold water, but boiling water dissolves it readily; the jelly is, however, almost all deposited on cooling. If this aqueous solution be boiled for a long time, it becomes analogous to mucilage, and loses the property of being jellied on cooling.

Gingi'væ, pl. of Gingi'va, (gignere, 'to beget,' because the teeth are, as it were, begotten in them.[?]) The gums, U'la, sing. U'lon; U'lum, Carnic'ula, (F.) Gencives. The portion of the mucous membrane of the mouth which covers the maxillary bones to the level of the alveolar arches. The gums are formed of a red tissue, more or less solid, and of a fibro-mucous nature, which adheres strongly to the necks of the teeth, and transmits, between the roots and their alveoli, a very thin expansion,—the alve'oloden'tal perios'teum. The gums fix the teeth and contribute greatly to their stability. In the aged, after the loss of the teeth, they become fibrous and very solid, and are inservient to mastication.

Gingiva'lis, Gin'gival, Ulet'icus, U'licus. Relating to the gums. The gin'gival line is a reddish streak or margin at the reflected edge of the gums, seen in phthisis and chronic blood diseases, and also in pregnant and puerperal women.

Gland, Glans, dim. Glan'dula, 'an acorn, a kernel,' A'den. The ancient anatomists gave this name to a number of organs of a texture generally soft, and a shape more or less globular, but differing greatly in their nature and functions. They applied it, for instance, 1. To those organs which separate from the blood any fluid whatever. When such organs were composed of several lobules, united by common vessels, they received the name conglom'erate glands, as the parotid, pancreas, &c. 2. To the reddish and spongy, knot-like bodies, which are met with in the course of the lymphatics. These they called con'globate glands; — see Ganglion (lymphatic). 3. To various other organs, whose intimate texture and functions are still unknown, as the Pineal gland, Pituitary gland, Glands of Pacchioni, Thyroïd gland, Thymus gland, Suprarenal glands, &c. Chaussier restricts the word gland to those softish, granular, lobated organs, composed of vessels, and a particular texture, of which there are in the human body, the lachrymal, salivary, and mammary, the testicles, the liver, pancreas, and kidneys. These permanent glands, or glands with permanent ducts, are all destined to draw from the blood the molecules necessary for the formation of new fluids, and to convey these fluids externally, by means of one or more excretory ducts. Several glands, besides their excretory ducts, have special reservoirs, in which the fluids, secreted by them, collect, remain for a greater or less space of time, and undergo slight modifications before being evacuated; — such are, the gallbladder for the liver, the urinary bladder for the kidneys, &c. Each gland has an organization peculiar to it, but we know not the intimate nature of the glandular texture. Malpighi believed that the vessels terminate in small, solid masses, to which he gave the name—glan'dular grains or ac''ini. In these, he considered, the excretory ducts originate. Ruysch thought that the glands are entirely vascular, and that the excretory ducts are immediately continuous with the vasa afferentia, &c. The most accepted view, perhaps, is, that the secreting vessel is distributed on the animal membrane, which lines the minute excretory ducts, and that the secretion is effected from the liquor sanguinis by means of cells.

The term Glande (F.) is sometimes appropriated to the tumor formed by inflammation or engorgement of a lymphatic ganglion.

They are circular in the mammalia, excepting the camel and the llama, and elliptical in birds and cold-blooded animals; are flat in all animals, and generally composed of a central nucleus enclosed in a membranous sac. Chemically, they consist of hæmatin and globulin — hæ'matoglob'ulin, Cru'orin. By some, however, they, as well as Glob'ulin, Hæmatocrys'tallin, and Hæmoglob'ulin or Hæmoglo'bin, have been considered to be formed of one chemical substance, which is readily decomposed, and is the crystallizable material hæmato'idin. According to Hoppe-Seyler, they consist of hæmoglobin, with traces of albumen, cholesterin, protagon, and phosphate of potash. The chemical composition of the nucleus, where it exists, — it does not in man, — has been by some regarded as fibrin; by others, as fat; and by others, again, as a species of horn, to which the name nu'clein has been given. See Globulin. They vary in size in different animals. Their average long diameter in man is about $\frac{1}{3000}$th part of an inch.

Besides these, the blood contains white or pale globules, Leuc'ocytes, Leuc'ocythes, Blood bi'oplasts, (F.) Globules blancs ou plasmiques, which are probably lymph and chyle corpuscles in process of development into red corpuscles. M. Bernard is of opinion that, while the red globule is the respiratory element of the blood, the white globule is its plastic element. The proportion of white to red corpuscles, is about 2 or 3 to 1000. See Blood.

Dried blood globules of the ox have been given internally in cases of anæmia.

Glob'ulin, Crys'tallin, Glob'uline, Blood ca'sein. The colorless substance that remains after the abstraction of the coloring matter of the blood-globule. It is a peculiar albuminous principle. The globulin of Berzelius consists of the envelopes of the blood globules, and of the part of their contents that remains after the extraction of the hæmatin. Lecanu regards it as identical with albumen; and, according to Mulder, it belongs to the combinations of protein. Robin and Verdeil consider it to be albuminose. See Globules, red.

The term globulin is likewise given by M. Donné to small granulations appertaining to the chyle, which are observable in the blood with the microscope. They are small, white, roundish, isolated or irregularly agglomerated grains; of about the $\frac{1}{300}$ of a millimètre in diameter, and are regarded by M. Donné as the first elements of the blood-globules. They are the white granulated corpuscles of Mandl.

It depends generally on an inflammatory swelling of the organ. At times, however, a chronic glossocele, or sort of œdematous engorgement, is met with, which proceeds to a great length, and deforms the dental arches, the lips, &c. Inflammatory glossocele must be combated by antiphlogistics. In the œdematous kind, such as is sometimes caused by excessive salivation, the infiltrated fluid may be pressed back by the hand of the practitioner, to get the tongue behind the teeth; and it may be kept there by a piece of gauze tied over the mouth. The chronic, elongated kind sometimes requires amputation of a portion of the organ.

It is soft, of a grayish white, viscid consistence, and very elastic. Exposed to the air, it becomes hard, brown, and fragile; and, in moist air, putrefies. Water and alcohol do not dissolve it. It is soluble in vegetable, and in weak mineral, acids, at a high temperature. The farinæ, in which it is found, are those preferred for the preparation of bread, on account of the property it has of making the paste rise. It is a compound of protein, and hence has been ranged among the "proteinaceous alimentary principles" by Dr. Pereira. By washing wheaten dough with a stream of water, the gum, sugar, starch, and vegetable albumen are removed: the ductile, tenacious, elastic, gray mass left is the gluten, *common gluten, Beccari'a's gluten. When cold, add ℥iij. of tincture of opium. The following form is recommended by a committee of the Philadelphia college of Pharmacy: *Tinct. The formulæ, however, differ. That of the United States was a muriate with two bases; and was prepared, according to the form of Dr. Chrestien, by dissolving the gold in a mixture of nitric and muriatic acids, and adding chloride of sodium to the residuum after evaporation; then redissolving and evaporating slowly to dryness. The Parisian formula for the Muriate d'or, Mu'rias seu Chlorure'tum Auri, consisted in simply dissolving the gold in the acids, and evaporating to dryness. It has been recommended as an antisyphilitic in old, rebellious, venereal affections, exostoses, and in venereal, scrofulous, or cancerous glandular enlargements. Dose, gr. 1-8th to gr. ss., rubbed on the tongue or gums. Internally, one-sixteenth of a grain, in pills.

It may be excited spontaneously, or by irritants applied directly to the membrane, Pseudogonorrhœ'a; but is usually produced by impure connection. Two great varieties have been generally reckoned: — 1. Gonorrhœ'a Pu'ra seu Benig'na, that which does not follow an impure connection; (F.) Échauffement, Blennorrhag''ia benig'na, Catarrhœ'a benig'na, Catar'rhus Ure'thræ, Gonorrhœ'a catarrha'lis seu non-contagio'sa: and, 2. Gonorrhœ'a Impu'ra, malig'na, contagio'sa, syphilit'ica, et virulen'ta; Flu'or al'bus malig'nus, Fluxus vene'reus, Blennorrhœ'a lu'des, Baptorrhœ'a, Myxio'sis, Lu'es gonorrho'ica, Scroph'ulæ gonorrho'icæ, Tuber'cula gonorrho'ica, Clap, (Old E.) Chawdpys, (F.) Chaudepisse; that which is the result of impure commerce. The French also distinguish the Chaudepisse sèche, or that unaccompanied with discharge, and the Chaudepisse cordée, Gonorrhœ'a corda'ta, Chordurethri'tis, or that accompanied with chordee, and which, of course, occurs only in the male. See Chordee. It is the kind that most frequently engages the attention of the practitioner, and is characterized by mucous discharge from the urethra or vagina, intermixed with specific matter, and accompanied with burning pain on micturition. It is decidedly infectious. It is, however, a distinct disease from syphilis, and never produces it. Its duration is various, but the inflammatory symptoms usually subside in four or five weeks, generally leaving behind more or less of the gonorrhœa mucosa or gleet. Gonorrhœa of every kind, attended with any inflammatory symptoms, is best treated by the antiphlogistic regimen, avoiding every kind of irritation, and keeping the body cool by small doses of salts, and the urine diluted by the mildest fluids. After the inflammatory symptoms have subsided, cubebs, or the balsam of copaiba, exhibited in the dose of ℥ss. to ℥j., three times a day, will be found effectual: indeed, during the existence of the inflammatory symptoms, it often affords decided relief. Injections are rarely required.

Sometimes, gonorrhœa affects the glans; when it is called Gonorrhœ'a Spu'ria seu Bal'ani seu Præputia'lis, Balanoblennorrhœ'a, Balanorrhœ'a, Balani'tis, Blennorrhag''ia spu'ria seu no'tha, Exter'nal Clap, (F.) Blennorrhagie du gland, Gonorrhée bâtarde, Fausse Blennorrhagie. It requires only cleanliness and cooling lotions. This is the simple form of balanitis. It may, however, be of the impure kind — Balanorrhag''ia, (F.) Balanite contagieuse. When implicating both glans and prepuce, it is Bal'ano-posthi'tis.

Some other varieties of gonorrhœa have been enumerated, but they are of little moment.

In consequence of repeated attacks of gonorrhœa, or of the debility induced by a single attack, it not unfrequently happens, as already remarked, that a constant, small discharge occurs, or remains behind, after all danger of infection is removed. The great difference between it and gonorrhœa is, that it is uninfectious. The discharge consists of globular particles, contained in a slimy mucus, and is generally devoid of that yellow color which characterizes the discharge of gonorrhœa virulenta. It is unattended with pain, scalding, &c. To this state the names Gleet, Gonorrhœ'a lon'ga seu chron'ica, Gonorrhœ'a muco'sa, Blennorrhœ'a lon'ga seu chron'ica, Blennorrhœ'a, &c., have been given. It is commonly a disease of some duration, and demands the use of the copaiba, astringent injections, and, if obstinate, the introduction of the bougie.

Gorg″et, ([F.] gorge, 'the throat,') Cana'lis canicula'tus, Duc'tor Canicula'tus, (F.) Gorgeret. An instrument representing a long gutter, in the shape of a throat, which is especially employed in the operations of lithotomy and fistula in ano.

Gorg″et, Cut'ting, see Gorget, and Lithotomy.

Gorg″et for Fis'tula in A'no consists of a semi-cylindrical wooden staff, four inches long, without including the handle, and furnished with a wide groove. This is introduced into the rectum, to prevent the point of the bistoury from injuring the intestine, when the internal orifice of the fistula is deeply situate, and it is desirable to perform the operation by incision. This instrument, invented by Marchettis, has been modified by Percy, Runge, &c.

Desault invented an instrument for conducting the wire by the anus, in the operation for fistula by ligature. He called it Gorgeret à repoussoir.

Gorg″et, Lithot'omy, (F.) Gorgeret Lithotome, Cut'ting Gorg″et, is the one used in the operation for the stone, for the purpose of dividing the prostate and the neck of the bladder, so as to enable the surgeon to introduce the forceps and extract the stone. At the end of this gorget is a crest or beak, which fits the groove of the staff, and admits of the gorget being passed along it into the bladder. Besides cutting, there are also blunt gorgets, intended to be introduced into the wound — their concavity serving as a guide for the forceps into the bladder.

The chief modifications in the gorget have been made by Andouillet, Bell, Blicke, Bromfield, Cline, Desault, Foubert, Hawkins, Larrey, Lefèvre, Michaelis, Thomas, Physick, Gibson, and others.

The bark of the root, Gossyp'ii Radi'cis Cor'tex, is officinal (Ph. U. S., 1873). A decoction of the root, Gossyp'ii ra'dix, has been prescribed as an emmenagogue and parturifacient. The fluid extract of the root is officinal in the last edition of the Ph. U. S. (1873). The Cotton wool, Cotton, Raw cotton, Gossyp'ium (Ph. U. S.), is used in medicine for making moxas, &c., and is applied in the treatment of recent burns and scalds, as a surgical dressing in abscesses and suppurating surfaces, &c., French wadding made from the purest cotton being preferred. Saturated with glycerine — glyc″erized cot'ton — it has been employed as a dressing for wounds, ulceration of the os uteri, &c.; mixed with iodine — i'odized cotton — it has been applied, bound with a bandage, over glandular enlargements, especially scrofulous swellings of children. The oil from the seed has been suggested as a substitute for olive oil in liniments, ointments, lead plaster, &c.

Gout, Arthri'tis, Arth'ragra, Arthral'gia, Mor'bus domino'rum seu articula'ris, Ma'lum articulo'rum, Gut'ta, Arthro'sia Pod'agra, Podal'gia, Pod'agra, Arthrit'icus ve'rus, Arthri'tis Podagra, Podagra Arthri'tis, Fluxio arthrit'ica, Fe'bris arthrit'ica seu Podag'rica, Arthrodyn'ia podag'rica, Caum'a podag'ricum, Flerecin, Gastroarthri'tis, Misopto'chos, (Sc.) Gut, (F.) Goutte, Agrie of Piorry. The gout was formerly regarded as a catarrh, and received its name from (F.) goutte, (L.) gutta, 'a drop;' because it was believed to be produced by a liquid, which distilled, goutte à goutte, 'drop by drop,' on the diseased part. This name, which seems to have been first used about the year 1270, has been admitted into the different languages of Europe. Gout is an inflammation of the fibrous and ligamentous parts of the joints. It almost always attacks, first, the great toe; whence it passes to the other smaller joints, after having produced, or been attended with, various sympathetic phenomena, particularly in the digestive organs: after this, it may attack the greater articulations. It is an affection which is extremely fugitive, and variable in its recurrence. It may be acquired, or hereditary. In the former case, it rarely appears before the age of thirty-five; in the latter, it is frequently observed earlier. It is often difficult to distinguish it from rheumatism. A combination is, indeed, supposed to exist sometimes; hence called Rheumat'ic gout, rheum'atoid arthri'tis, chron'ic rheumatic arthritis, or chronic os'teo-arthri'tis. See Rheumatism. During the paroxysm or fit, a burning, lancinating pain is experienced in the affected joint, attended with tumefaction, tension, and redness. One or more joints may be attacked, either at the same time or in succession; and, in either case, the attack terminates by resolution in a few days. This is the Arthri'tis acu'ta seu inflammato'ria seu regula'ris, Reg'ular gout, Arthro'sia pod'agra regula'ris, Arth'ragra legit'ima seu ve'ra seu genui'na seu norma'lis, (F.) Goutte régulière chaude. At other times, pains in the joints exist, of more or less acute character; the swelling being without redness. These pains persist, augment, and diminish irregularly, without exhibiting intermission, and, consequently, without having distinct paroxysms. The disease is then called aton'ic, asthen'ic, imper'fect or irregular gout, Chronic gout, Arthri'tis aton'ica seu asthen'ica, Arthro'sia Pod'agra larva'ta, Dysarthri'tis, Arth'ragra. It is commonly called in France Goutte froide, Goutte blanche. It may appear primarily, or succeed attacks of regular gout.

Gout does not always confine itself to the joints. It may attack the internal organs: when it is called Arthritis aber'rans seu errat'ica seu pla- net'ica seu vaga, Planar'thragra, Arth'ragra anom'ala, Pod'agra aber'rans, Vare'ni, Wan'dering, mispla'ced, or anom'alous gout, (F.) Goutte vague.

Ret'rograde or Retroce'dent, Rece'dent or mispla'ced gout, Arthritis retrog'rada, Pod'agra retrog'rada, Arthro'sia Podagra complica'ta seu retroce'dens, (F.) Goutte remontée, G. malplacée, G. rentrée, is when it leaves the joints suddenly and attacks some internal organ, as the stomach, intestines, lungs, brain, &c.—The term Arthri'tis urat'ica has been applied also to gout on account of the abnormal exudations of urates into the articular cavities, and the parenchyma of the cartilage, bones, &c., bounding the joints.

Gout is also called, according to the part it may affect, Pod'agra, Gon'agra, Chi'ragra, &c. It may be acute or chronic, and may give rise to concretions, Arthrit'ic cal'culi, which are chiefly composed of urate of soda. It may, also, give occasion to nodosities, when it is called Arthritis nodo'sa, (F.) Goutte nouée. See Arthritis deformans.

The treatment of active gout is antiphlogistic, and the local disorder should be but little interfered with. Colchicum seems to have great power over the disease. It forms the basis of the Eau médicinale d'Husson, a celebrated French gout-remedy. The author — a long sufferer — relied wholly on the Vinum colchici radicis. The bowels must be kept regular by rhubarb and magnesia; and a recurrence of the disease be prevented by abstemious habits.

Granula'tion, Granula'tio, (from granule,) Gem'ma, (F.) Bourgeon, B. charnu. Granulations are the reddish, conical, flesh-like shoots, which form at the surface of suppurating wounds and ulcers. They are the product of inflammatory excitement, and may be produced in indolent ulcers, by exciting the parts by proper stimulants. They form the basis of the cicatrix.

Granula'tion is, likewise, a name given by the modern French physicians to an organic lesion, consisting in the formation of small, round, firm, shining, semi-transparent tumors, of the size and shape of millet-seed, or of a pea, which are met with in the lungs particularly, and in considerable quantity; often without materially interfering with their functions. See Trachoma.

In pharmacy, granulation is a process by which a metal is reduced to fine grains, by melting it, and causing it, while liquid, to pass through a kind of sieve into a vessel of water — as in the making of shot, or by shaking or rubbing the melted metal in an appropriate box or vessel — as in the formation of granular tin or zinc.

A vegetable diet and alkaline drinks are the best prophylactics. See Calculi, urinary. A fit of the Gravel, Nephral'gia calculo'sa seu areno'sa, Co'lica nephrit'ica, is the excruciating suffering induced by the passage of gravel from the kidney to the bladder. The specific gravities of different bodies are, therefore, as the weights, bulk for bulk. For solids, and liquids, water is taken as the unit; atmospheric air for the gases. Thus, water is 1·000; mercury, at the common temperature, 13·58; whence, we conclude mercury is between thirteen and fourteen times heavier than water.

When the specific gravity of a substance is given, its temperature is assumed to be at 60° Fahr.

The weight, however, varies, according to different circumstances, as the degree of tenacity of the fluid, and the extent of moist surface to which the suspended drop is attached before it falls; and it was found by Mr. Alsop to be influenced by the size of the bottle, and the angle of inclination at which it was held during the operation of dropping. The following are some of his results as to the number of drops required to measure a fluidrachm, when dropped from a large and small bottle:

Prof. Wm. Procter, of Philadelphia, has given a table of the number of drops to a fluidrachm of essential oils, when dropped from the bottles from which they are commonly dispensed, and from a minim measure; and Mr. Edward Parrish one of different liquids dropped, under like circumstances, from pint and half pint tincture bottles, and from a minim measure. The following is the number of drops of different liquids equivalent to a fluidrachm — the result of the observations of Mr. Durand, of Philadelphia:

Boil to a proper thickness, and add a quarter of a pound of sugar, and two spoonfuls of yeast. Set the whole in a warm place, near the fire, for six or eight weeks; then place it in the open air until it becomes a syrup

Lastly, decant, filter, and bottle it up, adding a little sugar to each bottle. One drop is equal to three of laudanum; and it is nearly devoid of all the unpleasant exciting effects of the latter. An analogous formula is contained in the Pharmacopœia of the United States (1873) under the name Ace'tum opii, Vinegar of Opium. (Opium, dried, in moderately coarse powder, ℥v., nutmeg, in powder, ℥j., sugar, ℥viij., and diluted acetic acid, q. s. Macerate the opium and nutmeg in a pint of the acid for 24 hours; put the mixture in a conical glass percolator, and return the liquid which passes until the filtrate becomes clear. Gradually pour on diluted acetic acid until the filtered liquid measures f℥xxvj. In this dissolve the sugar, strain the solution, and add sufficient acid to make the whole measure two pints.) A fluidounce contains 75 grains of opium. A grain of opium is represented by about 6½ minims.

Blood is then passed by vomiting, and sometimes, also, by stool, — the blood being generally of a grumous aspect. Hæ-matemesis may be active or passive, acute or chronic. The blood effused proceeds from rupture of vessel, or from a sanguineous exhalation at the surface of the mucous membrane of the stomach. It is often observed in females whose menstrual secretion is irregularly performed. It is not of much danger, except when connected with disease of some of the solid viscera of the abdomen. On dissection of those who have died from protracted hæmatemesis, — for the acute kind is comparatively devoid of danger, — the mucous membrane of the stomach is found red and inflamed, or black, and the vessels considerably dilated. Complete abstinence from food; rest; the horizontal posture; bleeding, if the hemorrhage be active; cold, acidulous drinks, &c., constitute the usual treatment.

It resides in distinct particles or globules, and, in the opinion of some observers, in the envelope of the globules. Others have used it for tumors arising from effusion of blood into the tunica vaginalis: — hæmatocele, according to them, differing from hydrocele, only in the character of the effusion (Heister). Others, again, have applied it to effusions of blood into the interior of the tunica albuginea itself (Richter). The first is the usual acceptation. It is most commonly caused by wounds or contusions: and requires the use of antiphlogistics, discutients, &c. Sometimes it is necessary to evacuate the effused blood.

An extremely alarming carcinomatous affection, which was first described, with accuracy, by Mr. John Burns, of Glasgow. It consists in the development of cancerous tumors, with violent heat and pain, and with fungus and bleeding excrescences. Even when the diseased part is extirpated at a very early period, recovery rarely follows; other organs being generally implicated at the same time. Fungus hæmatodes was the term first applied to the disease by Mr. Hey of Leeds. Mr. J. Burns called it Spon'goid inflamma'tion, from the spongy, elastic feel, which peculiarly characterizes it, and continues even after ulceration has taken place. The disease has, most frequently, been met with in the eyeball, the upper and lower extremities, testicle, and mamma; but it occurs in the uterus, ovary, liver, spleen, brain, lungs, thyroid gland, and in the hip and shoulder joints.

Some French surgeons designate, by this name, those tumors which were formerly termed anormales, caverneuses, variqueuses, called Érectiles by Dupuytren, Hématoncies by Alibert, and Telangiectasiæ by Gräfe.

It is considered to be hæmatin separated from the globules of the blood, and passed from the state of a non-crystallizable organic substance to one of a crystalline chemical compound. The chronic kind is more troublesome. It requires acidulated or aluminous drinks; chalybeates and tonics in general. Hemorrhage from the mucous membrane of the lungs; characterized by the expectoration of more or less florid and frothy blood. It is generally preceded by cough, dyspnœa, sense of heat in the chest, &c. It is important to discriminate between hæmoptysis produced by some accidental cause acting irregularly or peridically on the lungs; and that which is, as it were, constitutional, and dependent on organic affection of the lungs or heart, or some faulty conformation of the chest. These two varieties differ as much in their prognosis and method of treatment as in their causes. Constitutional hæmoptysis is a serious disease, almost always announcing phthisis pulmonalis. The accidental variety is chiefly dangerous by frequent recurrence, and consequent great loss of blood.

The general causes of hæmoptysis are the same as those of other kinds of hemorrhage. It has, besides, particular causes; such as too great exercise of the lungs, loud speaking, playing on wind instruments, breathing acrid vapors, &c. It usually occurs between puberty and the age of 35. A sudden and terrific kind of hæmoptysis is sometimes met with; consisting in a great afflux of blood to the lungs. This has been called Pul'monary Ap'oplexy or Extravasa'tion, Apoplex'ia pulmona'lis seu pulmo'num, Hæmorrhag''ia pulmona'lis, Pneumorrhag''ia, Infarc'tus hæmorrhag''icus pulmo'num, I. hæmopto'icus Laënnec'ii, (F.) Apoplexie pulmonaire, Hémoptysie foudroyante, Hémorrhagie interstitielle du Poumon. Infiltration of blood into the air-cells may occur without any spitting of blood. Any extravasation of blood into the tissue of the lungs has been termed by M. Hendrin pneumohémorrhagie.

Physical signs. Percussion may not always aid us in hæmoptysis, but generally a circumscribed dulness will be perceived. The inspiratory murmur, on auscultation, is feeble or absent, locally; and is replaced by bronchial respiration and bronchoph'ony. A fine liquid crepitus is detected around the affected part; and in the larger tubes, near the spine, a liquid bubbling rhonchus is usually heard. The value of these signs is determined by the nature of the expectoration. The treatment of hæmoptysis must be like that of internal hemorrhage in general.

Hemorrhages may be spontaneous or traumatic: the first belong to the domain of medicine, the latter to that of surgery. They may, also, be internal or external; general — as in scurvy — or local. The hemorrhages by exhalation — those which chiefly interest the physician — have been classed, by Pinel, as follows: — 1. Hemorrhage of the Mucous Membranes; Epistaxis, Hæmoptysis, Hæmatemesis, Hæmorrhoids, Hæmaturia, Uterine Hemorrhage. 2. Hemorrhage of the Tissues; Cutaneous, Cellular, Serous, Synovial.

Hemorrhages have generally been distinguished into active and passive: in other words, into those dependent upon augmentation of the organic actions, and those dependent upon debility. According to Broussais, no spontaneous hemorrhage is passive; all are active — that is, produced by increased action and excess of irritation of the bloodvessels: they may occur with debility, but not from debility. He calls those only passive hemorrhages, which are owing to an external lesion of the vessels. Hemorrhages have been, by some, divided into constitutional, or those depending on original conformation; accidental, or those produced by some adventitious cause; supplementary, or those which succeed others; symptomatic, critical, &c. A secondary hemorrhage is one that occurs some time after wounds or operations.

When hemorrhage takes place into any tissue, or is interstitial, it receives the name, with many, of apoplexy.

Ac'tive Hem'orrhage, Hemorrhag''ia acti'va seu arterio'sa, Caum'a hæmorrhag''icum, Angeiorrhag''ia, occurs chiefly in the young and plethoric. Good living; the use of fermented liquor, excessive exercise, or too sedentary a life, may, perhaps, be ranked as predisponent causes. It is commonly preceded by heaviness and pulsation in the part, — owing to the afflux of blood and consequent hyperæmia, — and by coldness of the extremities. The blood, evacuated, is generally of a florid red. In such active hemorrhages, the great indications of treatment will be, to diminish plethora where it exists, and to lessen the heart's action. Bleeding, purgatives, and cold, with dry diet, will be the chief agents.

Pas'sive Hem'orrhage, Hæmorrhag''ia passi'va seu veno'sa, Profu'sio, P. hæmorrhag''ica, occurs in those of weak constitution; or who have been debilitated by protracted disease, poor diet, long watching, excessive evacuations, &c.

The direct causes may be: previous active hemorrhage; scorbutus, or anything capable of inducing atony or asthenic hyperæmia of the small vessels. These hemorrhages are not preceded by excitement or by any signs of local determination. They are usually accompanied by paleness of the countenance, feeble pulse, fainting, &c. The indications of treatment will be:—to restore the action of the small vessels and the general tone of the system; hence the utility of styptics and cold externally; and of tonics and astringents, creasote, mineral acids, &c., internally. Hemorrhage also occurs from mechanical hyperæmia, as when hæmoptysis is produced by tubercles in the lungs; apoplexy by softening of the encephalic neurine; hæmatemesis by disease of some of the solid viscera of the abdomen, &c.

In Traumat'ic Hem'orrhages, or those which are the consequences of wounds of arterial or venous trunks, the blood is of a florid red color, and issues by jets and pulses, if it proceed from an artery: while it is of a deeper red, issues slowly and by a continuous flow, if from a vein. If the capillary vessels be alone divided, the blood is merely effused at the surface of the wound. Of the means used for arresting these traumatic hemorrhages, some act mechanically, as absorbents, ligature, and compression; others chemically, as fire, caustic, creasote, astringents, &c.

Hæmorrhoid'al, Hemorrhoid'al, Hæmorrhoïda'lis, Hæmorrhoï'deus. Relating to hemorrhoids; as hemorrhoidal flux, hemorrhoidal tumors, &c.

Hæmorrhoid'al Ar'teries have been distinguished into superior, middle, and inferior. The first is the termination of the inferior mesenteric artery, which assumes the name superior hemorrhoidal, when it reaches the upper and posterior part of the rectum. The middle hemorrhoidal is furnished by the hypogastric or internal pudic. It ramifies on the inferior and anterior part of the rectum. The inferior hemorrhoidal arteries are branches of the internal pudic, furnished to the inferior part of the rectum and the anal muscles.

Hemorrhoid'al Nerves. These emanate from the sciatic and hypogastric plexuses; and cover the rectum with their numerous filaments.

Hemorrhoid'al Tu'mors. See Hemorrhois.

Hemorrhoid'al Veins follow the same distribution as the arteries, and generally empty themselves into the lesser mesenteric. Some of them assist in the formation of the hypogastric vein.

Hemorrhoid'al Ves'sels, Va'sa seda'lia, are those vessels which are distributed to the rectum—the seat of hemorrhoids.

Hæmor'rhoïs, gen. Hæmorrho'idis, Aimor'rhoïs, Asclepias'mus, (hæmo, and ῥεω, 'I flow,' Aimor'roïs, Proc'tica Maris'ca, Maris'ca, Proctal'gia Hæmorrhoïda'lis, Mor'bus Hæmorrhoïda'lis, Hem'orrhoids, Hæm'orrhoids, Piles, Em'erods, Em'eroids, Em'erandes, (F.) Hémorrhoïdes. The essential symptoms of this affection are:—Livid and painful tubercles or excrescences (Hemorrhoid'al tu'mors), usually attended with a discharge of mucus or blood, Hemorrhoidal flux, Hæmorrhag''ia proc'tica, Proctor'rhois, Hæmoproc'tia, Hæmorrhœ'a vaso'rum hæmorrhoïda'lium, (F.) Hémaproctie, Hémoproctie. The most common causes of piles are a sedentary life; accumulation of fæces in the rectum; violent efforts at stool; pregnancy, &c. The precursory symptoms are: pains in the loins; stupor of the lower limbs; and uneasiness in the abdomen and rectum, with more or less gastric, cerebral, and indeed general disorder;—constituting the Diath'esis Hæmorrhoïda'lis, Mo'tus seu Tur'ba Hæmorrhoïda'lis, and Moli'men Hæmorrhoïda'lĕ, of most of the writers of Continental Europe. To these symptoms follow one or more round, smooth, renitent, painful, pulsating, and erectile tumors, around the margin of the anus, or within the anus; some pouring out blood occasionally. After having remained, for a time, tense and painful, they gradually shrink and disappear. The chief symptoms, occasioned by hemorrhoidal tumors, when much inflamed, are:—constant pain, liable, however, to exacerbations, and to become augmented by the least pressure, or by the passage of the fæces, and obliging the patient to preserve the horizontal posture.

Hemorrhoids have generally been distinguished into—Hæmorrho'ides Fluen'tes seu Marisco'sæ, Proc'tica Maris'ca cruen'ta, Bleed'ing or O'pen Piles; and into H. non fluen'tes, Proc'tica Maris'ca cæ'ca, Hæmorrho'ides cæ'cæ seu furen'tes, Hæmorrhoida'les no'di, Shut or blind piles. They have, also, been divided into internal or occult, and external, according to their situation; and into accidental or constitutional.

Hemorrhoidal Tumors are extremely troublesome, by their disposition to frequent recurrence; and they are apt to induce fistula; otherwise, they are devoid of danger. When anatomically examined, they are found not to consist in a varicose dilatation of the veins of the rectum, but to be formed of a very close, spongy texture, similar to that which surrounds the orifice of the vagina, and to be erectile, like it. They are surrounded by a delicate membrane, and have no internal cavity. The treatment, in mild cases of hemorrhoidal tumors, is simple. Rest; the horizontal posture; the use of mild laxatives, as sulphur, castor oil, and emollient glysters, will be sufficient. If they be much inflamed, leeches may be applied; and warm cataplasms or cold lotions, according to circumstances, be prescribed, with abstinence, and cooling drinks. Afterwards, an ointment, composed of powdered galls and opium, may afford relief. It is in the relaxed kind, that such ointment, with proper attention to diet, &c., can alone be expected to afford much benefit. If, after repeated attacks, the tumors remain hard and painful, and threaten fistula, they may be removed.

By Hemorrhoid'al Flux, Flux'us hæmorrhoïda'lis, Proctorrhag''ia, is meant the hemorrhage which takes place from the rectum, owing to hemorrhoids. It is a common affection. The quantity of blood discharged is various; at times, it is very trifling; at others, sufficient to induce great debility, and even death. It is announced and accompanied by the same symptoms as precede and attend hemorrhoidal tumors. Like other hemorrhages, it may be active or passive, accidental or constitutional. The prognosis is rarely unfavorable. The affection may, almost always, be relieved by properly adapted means. These resemble such as are necessary in hemorrhages in general. Perfect quietude, mental and corporeal; light diet; cooling drinks; bleeding, if the symptoms indicate it; astringents, if the disease be protracted and passive, such as the Tinctura Ferri Chloridi; aspersions of cold water on the anus; astringent injections; plugging, and compression. Such will be the principal remedial agents. When the hemorrhage has become habitual, or is vicarious, some caution may be required in checking it; and, if inconvenience arise from a sudden suppression, its return may be solicited by the semicupium, sitting over warm water, aloetic purgatives, glysters, irritating suppositories, &c.; or leeches may be applied to the anus.

To the internal bleeding pile, a soft, red, strawberry-like elevation of the mucous membrane, Dr. Houston, of Dublin, gave the name vas'cular tu'mor. For its removal he recommends the application of nitric acid, so as to produce sloughing of its surface.

A fissure or perpendicular division of one or both lips. It has been so called, in consequence of the upper lip of the hare being thus divided. Harelip is generally congenital; at other times it is accidental, or produced by a wound, the edges of which have not been brought into contact, and have healed separately. It is simple, when there is but one division; double, when there are two; and complicated, when there is, at the same time, a division or cleft of the superior maxillary bone and of the palate—Cleft, split, or fis'sured pal'ate, Wolf's jaw. Pala'tum fis'sum, Ric'tus lupi'nus; or a projection of the teeth into the separation of the lip.

In the Harelip operation, there are two indications to be fulfilled. First, to pare, with the knife or scissors, the edges of the cleft, and, afterwards, to preserve them in contact, in order to cause adhesion. This last object is accomplished by means of pins, passed through the edges of the division: in other words, by the twisted suture. The projecting teeth must, of course, be previously removed. If there be separation of the palate, it will become less and less after the union of the lip, or the operation of staphylorraphy may be performed upon it.

the receptacle for the greater part of the organs of the senses.

Heart, (Sax. heopt, [G.] Herz,) Cor, Ccar, Cer, Car'dia, (F.) Cœur. An azygous muscle, of an irregularly pyramidal shape; situate obliquely and a little to the left side, in the chest;—resting on the diaphragm by one of its surfaces; — suspended by its base from the great vessels; free and movable in the rest of its extent, and surrounded by the pericardium. The right side of the body of the heart is thin and sharp, and is called Mar'go acu'tus: the left is thick and round, and termed Margo obtu'sus. It is hollow within, and contains four cavities; two of which, with thinner and less fleshy walls, receive the blood from the lungs and the rest of the body; and pour it into two others, with thick and very fleshy parietes, which send it to the lungs and to every part of the body. Of these cavities, the former are called auricles, the latter ventricles. The right auricle and right ventricle form the Pulmon'ic or right or anterior heart, Cor veno'sum seu pulmona'lĕ, (F.) Cœur du poumon, C. du sang noir, C. droit, C. antérieur: and the left auricle and ventricle, the system'ic, corpo'real, left, or aor'tic heart, Cor arterio'sum seu aor'ticum, (F.) Cœur du corps, C. gauche, C. cortique ou C. rouge. In the adult, these are totally distinct from each other, being separated by a partition;—the sep'tum cor'dis. Into the right auricle, the venæ cavæ — superior and inferior — and the coronary vein open. The pulmonary artery arises from the right ventricle (see Conus arteriosus); the four pulmonary veins open into the left auricle, and the aorta arises from the left ventricle.

The mean weight of the heart, in the adult, from the twenty-fifth to the sixtieth year, is, according to Bouillaud, from eight to nine ounces. The dimensions, according to Lobstein and Bouillaud, are as follows:—Length, from base to apex, five inches, six lines; breadth, at the base, three inches; thickness of the walls of the left ventricle, seven lines; at a finger's breadth above the apex, four lines; thickness of the walls of the right ventricle, two and a quarter lines; at the apex, half a line; thickness of right auricle, one line; of the left auricle, half a line. The heart is covered, externally, by a very thin, membranous reflection from the pericardium. The muscular structure of which it is constituted is much thicker in the parietes of the ventricle than in those of the auricles. Its cavities are lined by a very delicate membrane, the endocar'dium, which is continuous with the inner membrane of the arteries, as regards the left cavities, and with that of the veins, as regards the right. Its arteries—the coronary — arise from the commencement of the aorta. Its nerves proceed, chiefly, from the pneumogastric and the cervical ganglions of the great sympathetic. The heart is the great agent in the circulation. By its contraction, the blood is sent over every part of the body. Its action does not seem to be directly owing to nervous influence received from the brain or spinal marrow, or from both. The circulation may, indeed, be kept up for some time, if both brain and spinal marrow be destroyed.

When the ear is applied to the chest, a dull, lengthened sound is heard, which is synchronous with the arterial pulse. This is instantly succeeded by a sharp, quick sound, like that of the valve of a bellows or the lapping of a dog, and this is followed by a period of repose. The first sound — infe'rior or systol'ic sound — appears to be mainly produced by the contraction of the ventricles, and the consequent tension of the auriculo-ventricular valves; the second, or superior sound, by the reflux of the blood against the semilunar valves. These are what are called the Sounds of the Heart, Cardieche'mata, Son'itus cor'dis seu cardi'aci, (F.) Bruits du Cœur. Dr. C. J. B. Williams suggests the word lubb-dup as conveying a notion of the two sounds. The Beat'ing or Im'pulse of the heart, Heart-stroke, Apex beat, Pul'sus seu Ic'tus cor'dis, (F.) Impulsion ou choc du Cœur, against the parietes of the chest, is mainly caused by the systole of the heart, which tends to project it forwards. It is doubted, however, by some, whether the impulsion is produced by the dilatation or the contraction of the ventricles.

The following table exhibits the different actions of the heart, and their coincidence with its sounds and impulse. It presumes that the period from the commencement of one pulsation to that of another is divided into eight parts; and if the case of a person, whose pulse beats sixty times in a minute, be taken, each of these parts will represent the eighth of a second:

Eighths of a Second.
Last part of the pause	1	Auricles contracting; ventricles distended.
First sound and impulse	4	Ventricles contracting; auricles dilating.
Second sound	2	Ventricles dilating; auricles dilating.
Pause	1	Ventricles dilating; auricles distended.

The heart is subject to different organic diseases; the chief of which are aneurism, contraction of the apertures, and hypertrophy.

The physical signs

which indicate it are the following: In cases of long standing, the præcordial region is generally prominent; the pulsations of the heart are visible over a greater extent than natural; and a marked vibration is communicated to the hand when placed on the cardiac region. The dull sound on percussion is more extensive than natural; and on auscultation there is a permanent increase of the force and extent of the heart's action; there is no increase, however, of frequency, and the rhythm is regular. The pulse is generally strong, full, and hard.

Concen'tric Hy'pertrophy of the Heart, (F.) Hypertrophie concentrique, Hypertrophie centripète du Cœur, Retrait ventriculaire, Cardiarctie, is when the parietes augment at the expense of the cavities.

Heart, Hy'pertrophy with Dilata'tion of the, Ac'tive an'eurism, Eccen'tric hy'pertrophy. In this affection, the pulsations can be seen and felt over a larger space, and the apex is more to the left and lower down than natural. The impulse is less steady, but at times more violent than that which accompanies simple hypertrophy. Percussion gives more distinct evidence of the enlargement, the sound being more extensively dull. On auscultation, the impulse is often violent, but irregular; in extreme cases, it produces the sensation of a large mass of flesh rolling or revolving beneath the ear. The pulse is strong, full, and vibratory. The shock of the heart's action is often transmitted to the whole person, and to the bed on which the patient is lying.

Heat, (past participle of Sax. hætan, 'to make warm,') Ca'lor, Ther'ma, (F.) Chaleur. The material cause, which produces the sensation — or the particular sensation itself — produced by a body of an elevated temperature, on our organs, especially on the organs of touch. Modern chemists have given the name Calor'ic to the principle, whatever may be its nature, which is the cause of heat. When we touch a body of a temperature superior to our own, a portion of caloric passes from the body to the hand, and produces the sensation of heat. If, on the contrary, we touch a body of a temperature inferior to our own, we communicate a portion of our caloric to it, and experience the sensation of cold. Our own sensations are but imperfect indexes of temperature. Two men meeting at the middle of a mountain, —the one ascending, the other descending, — will experience different sensations. The one ascending, passes from a warmer to a colder atmosphere; — the one descending, from a colder to a warmer.

The terms Cal'ory and U'nit of heat, (F.) Calorie, Unité de chaleur and Therme, have been given to the quantity of heat required to raise a kilogramme of water one degree centigrade.

The chief instrument for measuring heat, used in medicine, is the Thermometer. Of this there are three kinds: — that of Fahrenheit, that of Réaumur, and that of Celsius or the Centigrade.

To reduce Centigrade degrees to those of Fahrenheit, multiply by 9, divide by 5, and add 32: thus, 40° Cent. × 9 ÷ 5 + 32 = 104° Fah. To reduce Fahrenheit's degrees to those of Centigrade, subtract 32, multiply by 5, and divide by 9: thus, 104° Fah. — 32 × 5 ÷ 9 = 40° Cent. To reduce Réaumur's degrees to those of Fahrenheit, multiply by 9, divide by 4, and add 32: thus, 32° Réaum. × 9 ÷ 4 + 32 = 104° Fah. To reduce Fahrenheit's degrees to those of Réaumur, subtract 32, multiply by 4, and divide by 9: thus, 104° Fah. — 32 × 4 ÷ 9 = 32° Réaum. To reduce Réaumur's degrees to those of Centigrade, multiply by 5, and divide by 4: thus, 32° Réaum. × 5 ÷ 4 = 40° Cent.; and, lastly, to reduce Centigrade degrees to those of Réaumur, multiply by 4, and divide by 5: thus, 40° Cent. × 4 ÷ 5 = 32° Réaum.

By the term gentle heat, Ph. U. S., 1873, is meant any temperature between 90° and 100°.

The normal temperature of the body may be regarded as on the average, from 98° to 100° or upwards. The blood of the right side of the heart is slightly hotter than that of the left; and the highest temperature observed is where the suprahepatic veins empty their blood into the vena cava ascendens. See Animal heat.

The varying temperature, as indicated by the thermometer, is a valuable element of diagnosis in morbid conditions, and Thermom'etry receives great attention.

The human body can bear a high degree of heat diffused in the atmosphere. There are cases on record, where air of 400° and upwards, of Fahrenheit's scale, has been breathed with impunity for a short time. It can likewise withstand very severe cold. In the expedition of Capt. Back to the Arctic regions, the thermometer was as low as — 70° of Fah., and Sir George Simpson affirms that it has fallen in Siberia to — 83°, or 115° below the freezing-point. Dr. Kane, in the Arctic regions, in 1853–54, observed the range of eleven spirit thermometers, selected as standards, to vary from — 60° to — 75°. The mean annual temperature was 5·2°, the lowest ever registered.

Excessive heat disposes the body to gastric and intestinal diseases, and particularly to inflammation and enlargement of the liver; hence, the frequency of such affections within the torrid zone. Heat is often used therapeutically; the actual cautery, at a white heat, disorganizes the parts to which it is applied: a lesser degree occasions violent inflammation. Heat higher than that of the human body is excitant: of a lower degree, sedative. Excessive cold acts as a powerful sedative —inducing sleep, the tendency to which, after long exposure, becomes irresistible. Many of the topical applications — as cataplasms—act wholly by virtue of their warmth and moisture.

Heat, Ar'dor vene'reus, Pruri'tus, (F.) Chaleurs, Chaleurs des Animaux, Folie, Rut, is the periodical sexual desire experienced by animals, — Œstrua'tion. It is supposed by some to be owing to the periodical maturation and discharge of ova, — Ovula'tion.

Heat, Inter'nal, (F.) Chaleur interne, is a sensation of heat felt by the patient, but not sensible to the touch; Exter'nal heat, (F.) Chaleur extérieure, that which can be felt by others. Heat, Ar'dor, is called moist, (F.) haliteuse, when accompanied with moisture, like that felt after bathing; dry, (F.) sèche, when the skin has not its ordinary softness. It is called acrid and pungent, Ca'lor mor'dax, (F.) âcre et mordicante, when it conveys a disagreeable tingling to the fingers. The French employ the terms ner'vous heat and errat'ic heat, Chaleur nerveuse and Chaleur erratique, for that which comes by flushes, alternating with chills, and which moves rapidly from one part to another. M. Double has used the term sep'tic heat, (F.) Chaleur septique, for that which produces a pungent sensation on the hand, similar to that of acrid heat, but milder and more uniform, and which is accompanied with feebleness and frequency of pulse, &c.

It is the fever of irritation and debility, and is characterized by progressive emaciation, frequent pulse, hot skin—especially of the palms of the hands and soles of the feet — and, towards the end, colliquative sweats and diarrhœa. Being symptomatic, it can only be removed by getting rid of the original affection. This is generally difficult, and almost hopeless in the disease which it most commonly accompanies — consumption.

Hel'icine Ar'teries, Arte'riæ Helici'næ, of the penis, as described by J. Müller, are short vessels given off from the larger branches, as well as from the finest twigs of the artery of the organ: most of them come off at a right angle, and project into the cavity of the spongy substance, either terminating abruptly or swelling out into a club-like process without again subdividing. Almost all these vessels are bent like a horn, so that the end describes half a circle or somewhat more. They have a great resemblance to the tendrils of the vine, whence their name. A minute examination of them, either with the lens or the microscope, shows that, although they at all times project into the venous cavities of the corpora cavernosa, they are not entirely naked, but are covered with a delicate membrane, which, under the microscope, appears granular.

Hepati'tis, gen. Hepati'tidis, Empres'ma hepati'tis, Cau'ma seu Inflamma'tio he'patis, I. Jecin'oris, Fe'bris hepat'ica inflammato'ria, Hepatal'gia phlegmonoï'des, Mor'bus jeciu'oris, Hepatophleg'monē, Inflamma'tion of the liver, (F.) Hépatite, Inflammation du foie, Pièce (Provincial); (hepato, and itis.) It may be seated either in the peritoneal covering, Serohepati'tis, Hepati'tis velamento'sa seu extern'a, Peritoni'tis hepat'ica, Perihepati'tis; or in the substance of the liver, Hepati'tis parenchymato'sa; or in both, Purohepati'tis, and may be acute or chronic. The peculiar symptoms are:—pain in the right hypochondrium, shooting to the back and right shoulder, and increased on pressure; difficulty of lying on the left side; sometimes jaundice with cough, and synocha. Its termination is generally by resolution:—in tropical climates it often runs on to suppuration, Jec'oris vom'ica, Hepati'tis apostemato'sa, Sup'purative hepati'tis, (F.) Hepatite Suppurée, the abscess breaking either externally, or forming a communication with the intestines or chest, or breaking into the cavity of the abdomen. The causes are those of inflammation in general. Heat predisposes to it; hence its greater frequency in hot climates. On dissection of those who have died of it, the liver has been found hard and enlarged; color of a deep purple; or the membranes have been more or less vascular; or adhesions, or tubercles, or hydatids, or abscesses, or biliary calculi, may be met with. The treatment must be bold. Bleeding, general and local, fomentations, blisters, purgatives, and the antiphlogistic regimen. In hot climates especially, a new action must be excited by mercury as early as possible.

Hepati'tis Apostemato'sa, see Hepatitis.

Hepati'tis, Chron'ic, Hepati'tis longa seu chron'ica, Inflamma'tio he'patis len'ta, Hepatitis occul'ta, Hepatic'ula, Subinflamma'tio he'patis, Chron'ic liv'er disease, (F.) Chronohépatite, is not as common as is believed. It may be suspected from the existence of the symptoms above mentioned, when in a minor degree; enlargement, constant dull pain in the region of the liver; sallow countenance; high-colored urine; clay-colored fæces, &c. The great object of treatment is to excite a new action by mercury and counter-irritants, and to keep the liver free by cathartics.

A chronic form of Interstit''ial Hepatitis, (F.) Hepatite Interstitielle, Sclérose du Foie, is generally described under the name of Cirrho'sis of the Liver. See Cirrhosis hepatis.

Typhoïde*, I. Hémorrhagique. A form of parenchymatous inflammation of the liver, characterized by a rapid and complete destruction of the hepatic cells throughout every part of the organ, occurring in early adult life, and indicated by jaundice, sometimes with petechiæ and extensive ecchymosis, vomiting of ingesta and mucus, and afterwards of altered blood resembling coffee-grounds; delirium, convulsions, and coma, usually ending fatally in about a week. The liver is found, on post-mortem examination, to be extensively atrophied, sometimes as much as two-thirds of its normal volume having disappeared.

Sauvages has distinguished two species of hepatocele: — the ven'tral (in the linea alba), and the umbil'ical or hepatomph'alum.

Hered'itary, Hæredita'rius, Heredita'rius. Gentilit''ius, Sym'phytos, Syn'genes, (F.) Héréditaire, (hæres, gen. hære'dis, 'an heir.') An epithet given to diseases, or to predispositions to diseases, communicated from progenitors. This communication is termed, by the French, Hérédité, Heredic''ity, and such diseases are said to be inherited. They may exist at birth; or may supervene at a more or less advanced period of existence. Hereditary diseases, Mor'bi heredita'rii, (F.) Maladies héréditaires, often prevail among several members of a family, or are family diseases or complaints.

Hermaph'rodite, Hermaphrodi'tus, Gy'nida, Androg''ynus, Monœ'cious, (Sc.) Scarcht, (Prov.) Scrat. One who possesses the attributes of male and female: who unites in himself the two sexes. A term, applied to an animal or plant which is, at the same time, both male and female. True hermaphrodites are only met with in the lower degrees of the animal scale, among the zoophytes, mollusca, or gasteropoda. The individuals of the human species, regarded as hermaphrodites, owe this appearance to a vicious conformation of the genital organs; a kind of monstrosity, which renders them unfit for generation, although an attentive examination may exhibit the true sex. Hermaphrodites have, likewise, been described, which, instead of uniting the attributes of both sexes, cannot be considered male or female. These have been called neu'tral hermaph'rodites.

By some, it is supposed to be identical with the I'ris tubero'sa. The best testimony seems to be in favor of its being a variety of the Colchicum, — Col'chicum Illyr'icum. Under the name Hermodactyls, roots or bulbs of an unknown plant, growing in the countries about the eastern extremity of the Mediterranean, are sold in the shops of Europe.

Her'nia, (from ἑρνος, 'a sprout,' 'a shoot' [?],) Ra'mex, Ruptu'ra, R. hernio'sa, Crepatu'ra, Ecop'ia hernio'sa, Ce'lē, Rup'ture, Burst, (F.) Hernie, Hargne, Descente, Effort, Greveure, Rompeure. Any tumor, formed by the displacement of a viscus or a portion of a viscus, which has escaped from its natural cavity by some aperture, and projects externally. Herniæ have been divided into,—1. Hernia of the Brain, or Encephalocele; 2. Hernia of the Thorax, or Pneumocele; 3. Hernia of the Abdomen.

Abdom'inal Herniæ are remarkable for their frequency, variety, and the danger attending them. They are produced by the protrusion of the viscera, contained in the abdomen, through the natural or accidental apertures in the parietes of that cavity. The organs, which form them most frequently, are the intestines and the epiploon. These herniæ have been divided, according to the apertures by which they escape, into:

1. In'guinal or Suprapu'bian Herniæ. These issue by the inguinal canal: they are called Bubonoce'lē, when small; and Scro'tal Hernia or Oscheoce'lē, in man, when they descend into the scrotum: — Vul'var Hernia or Puden'dal or La'bial Hernia, Episioce'lē, in women, when they extend to the Labia majora. See Bubonocele. Direct' inguinal hernia, Ventroin'guinal hernia, is where the protruding parts, in place of entering the internal ring, and descending along the inguinal canal, make a direct passage through the parietes of the abdomen opposite the external ring. 2. Cru'ral or Fem'oral Hernia, Meroce'lē, when they issue by the crural canal. 3. Infrapu'bian or Subpu'bic Hernia, (F.) Hernie soupubienne, Oödeoce'lē, Opeoce'lē, Opodeoce'lē, Her'nia foram'inis ova'lis seu obturato'ria, when the viscera escape through the opening, which gives passage to the infrapubian vessels. 4. Ischiat'ic or Sciat'ic Hernia; when it takes place through the great sciatic notch. 5. Umbil'ical Hernia, Hernia Umbilica'lis, Exom'phalos, Omphaloce'lē; when it occurs at the umbilicus or near it. 6. Epigas'tric Hernia;—occurring through the linea alba, above the umbilicus. 7. Hypogas'tric or Infraümbil'ical Hernia, Cœlioce'lē, Hypogastroce'lē,—when it occurs through the linea alba below the umbilicus. 8. Perine'al Hernia, Mesosceloce'lē, Hernia perinæ'i seu perinea'lis, — Perinæoce'lē, Perineoce'lē, when it takes place through the levator ani, and appears at the perineum. 9. Vag'inal Hernia, Colpoce'lē, Coleoce'le seu Elytroce'lē—through the parietes of the vagina. 10. Diaphragmat'ic Hernia, Diaphragmatoce'lē; when it passes through the diaphragm. The prolongation of the hernial sac in various directions within the abdominal walls is called Intrapari'etal or Intermus'cular hernia, (F.) Hernie en bissac.

Herniæ are likewise distinguished—according to the viscera forming them — into Enteroce'lē, Epiploce'lē, Enteroëpiploce'lē, Gastroce'lē, Cystoce'lē, Hepatoce'lē, Splenoce'lē, &c.

When a hernia can be restored to its natural cavity, by the aid of pressure, &c., properly applied, it is said to be redu'cible. It is, on the contrary, irredu'cible, when adhesion, bulk, &c., oppose its return. When the aperture, which has given passage to the hernia, occasions more or less constriction of the protruded portion, the hernia is said to be incar'cerated, H. obstruc'ta, or stran'gulated, H. strangula'ta; and, if the constriction be not removed, constipation, hiccough, vomiting, and all the signs of violent inflammation, followed by gangrene, supervene, with alteration of the features, small pulse, cold extremities, and death. See Incarceration.

The therapeutical indications are — 1. As regards reducible hernia: — to replace the viscera in the abdomen by the taxis; and to retain them there by the use of a truss, which, if properly adapted, may effect a radical cure. 2. As regards irreducible hernia: — to support the tumor by an appropriate suspensory bandage. 3. As regards strangulated hernia: — to have recourse to the taxis; bloodletting; warm bath; tobacco glysters; ice to the tumor; and, if these should not succeed, to perform an operation, which consists in dividing the covering of the hernia, and cutting the aponeurotic ring, which causes the strangulation; reducing the displaced viscera, unless their diseased condition should require them to be retained without; dressing the wound appropriately; restoring the course of the fæces by means of gentle glysters — preventing or combating inflammation of the abdominal viscera; conducting the wound to cicatrization, by appropriate means; and afterwards supporting the cicatrix by a bandage.

The word hernia was also used, of old, for the scrotum, and, not unfrequently, for the testicle.

Her'nia, Congen'ital, Her'nia congen'ita seu ingen'ita, H. of In'fancy, is a protrusion of some of the contents of the abdomen into the Tu'nica vagina'lis tes'tis, owing to a want of adhesion between its sides, after the descent of the testicle.

It is a disease which cannot be mistaken, and the treatment must obviously be strongly antiphlogistic, supporting the testicle during the treatment, and for some time afterwards; methodical compression has also been found useful. The disease is not generally of a serious character, going off as suddenly as it comes on. As it affects the epididymis more especially, when supervening on gonorrhœa or blennorrhœa, it is sometimes termed blennorrhag''ic epididymi'tis or gon'orrhœal orchi'tis.

Her'pes, gen. Herpe'tis, (ἑρπης, genitive, ερπητος,) Er'pes, Herpe'don, Her'pen, Ser'pens, (ἑρπω, 'I creep;' because it creeps and spreads about the skin,) Ec'phlysis Her'pes, Cytis'ma Her'pes, Olophlyc'tis, Tet'ter, Fret, (F.) Herpès, Dartre. A vesicular disease, which, in most of its forms, passes through a regular course of increase, maturation, decline, and termination, in from 10 to 14 days. The vesicles arise in distinct, but irregular, clusters, which commonly appear in quick succession, and near together, on an inflamed base; generally attended with heat, pain, and considerable constitutional disorder. The term, like most others which refer to cutaneous diseases, has not been accurately defined. The ancients had three varieties: the mil'iary, κεχγριαις; vesic'ular, φλυκταινωδης, and ero'ding, εσθιομενος. Bateman has the following varieties:—1. Herpes Phlyctæno'des, Her'pes milia'ris, Ec'phlysis Her'pes Milia'ris, Nirles, (F.) Dartre phlyctenoïde, in which the vesicles are millet-sized: pellucid; clusters commencing on an uncertain part of the body, and being progressively strewed over the rest of the surface; succeeded by fresh crops. 2. Herpes Zos'ter, Zos'ter, Zo'na ig'nea seu serpigino'sa, Ig'nis Per'sicus, Cinzill'a, Cin'gulum. Sa'cer ig'nis, Ec'phlysis Her'pes zos'ter, Her'pes peris'celis, Erysip'elas zos'ter seu phlyctænoï'des seu pustulo'sa, Zo'na, Cir'cinus, Perizo'ma, (F.) Ceinture, C. dartreuse, Feu Persique, Erysipèle pustuleux, Shingles, (Prov.) Cruels, in which the vesicles are pearl-sized; the clusters spreading round the body like a girdle; at times confluent, and occasionally preceded by constitutional irritation. A form of this affection seen on the side of the nose, the upper eyelid and the forehead, is called Her'pes zos'ter fronta'lis, H. ophthal'micus. browshin'gles. 3. Herpes Circina'tus, Formi'ca ambulato'ria, An'nulus re'pens, Her'pes serpi'go, Tin'ea circina'ta, Serpi'go, Ec'phlysis Her'pes Circina'tus, Ring'worm, Vesic'ular Ring'worm, (F.) Herpès circiné, Anneau Herpétique, consisting of vesicles with a reddish base, uniting in rings; the area of the rings slightly discolored, often followed by fresh crops. 4. Herpes Labia'lis, and 5. Herpes Præputia'lis, Aph'thæ præpu'tii, Ulcus'cula præpu'tii, appearing, respectively, on the lips and prepuce. 6. Herpes I'ris, I'ris, Rain'bow worm, occurring in small circular patches, each of which is composed of concentric rings of different colors. To these may be added, Herpes Ex'edens, H. esthiom'enus seu depas'cens seu fe'rus seu estiom'enus seu fe'rox, Ec'phlysis Her'pes ex'edens, Dar'ta excoriati'va seu malig'na, Lu'pus non ex'edens, Vitili'go(?), Len'cē (?), Formi'ca corrosi'va, For'mix, Pap'ula fe'ra, Ul'cerative Ring'worm, A'gria, (F.) Dartre rongeante, in which the vesicles are hard; clusters thronged; fluid dense, yellow or reddish, hot, acrid, corroding the subjacent skin, and spreading in serpentine trails.

All the varieties demand simply an antiphlogistic treatment, when attended with febrile irritation. The herpes circinatus, alone, requires the use of astringent applications which have the power of repressing the eruption.

Her'pes Circina'tus, see Herpes.

In medicine, Hiru'do seu Sanguisu'ga Medicina'lis, Bdel'la Medicina'lis or Medic''inal Leech, and Hirudo Sanguisuga officina'lis are generally employed. In the United States, H. decora is used. The leech lives in fresh water, and feeds on the blood of animals, which it sucks, after having pierced the skin with its three sharp teeth. This habit has been taken advantage of to produce local bloodletting. In applying the leech, the part must be wiped dry; and if there be difficulty in making it suck, a little milk or cream may be applied. When satiated, it will drop off, and by applying a little salt or vinegar to its head it will disgorge the blood. A good English leech will take about half an ounce of blood, including that which flows by fomenting the part subsequently. The American takes less.

Ho'mo, gen. Hom'inis, (F.) Homme, Man,—the chief and most perfect of the mammalia; in Greek, ανθρωπος, Anthro'pos, from ανα, 'upwards,' and τρεπω, 'I turn;' because man, alone, of all animals, possesses the natural power of standing erect. He is also the only animal whose incisor teeth, wedged in a projecting jaw, are absolutely vertical. Man is especially distinguished from other mammalia by the faculty which he possesses of classing his ideas; comparing them with each other; and connecting, representing, and transmitting them by signs and articulate sounds. He possesses in the highest degree all the attributes of intelligence — memory, judgment, and imagination. He inhabits all countries — the burning regions of the torrid zone, and the chilling atmosphere of the polar climes. In different situations he presents in his figure, color, and stature, differences which have caused mankind to be divided by naturalists into races or varieties. The number of such races can only be approximated. Blumenbach admits five — the Caucasian, Ethiopian, Mongolian, Malay, and American. Every division must necessarily be arbitrary, and the individuals composing each variety are far from being alike.

A fanciful doctrine, which maintains that disordered actions in the human body are to be cured by inducing other disordered actions of a like kind (simil'ia simil'ibus), and this to be accomplished by infinitesimally small doses, often of apparently inert agents; the decillionth part of a grain of charcoal, for example, is an authorized dose. It has also been called Glob'ulism.

According to Dr. Bigelow, homœopathy consists in leaving the case to nature, while the patient is amused with nominal and nugatory remedies.

So long ago as in the writings of Gregory the Great, there is the following remark: "Mos medicinæ est ut aliquando similia similibus, aliquando contraria contrariis curet. Nam sæpe calida calidis, frigida frigidis, sæpe autem frigida calidis, calida frigidis sanare consuevit."

The gangrene then manifests itself. It extends from the centre of the ulcerated surface towards the edges; these become swollen, painful, and everted; and the patient dies with all the signs of typhus. The treatment must be varied according to circumstances. Sometimes it requires the use of stimulating, acid, caustic, and antiseptic applications, with occasionally the actual cautery, aided by the exhibition of tonics internally; at others, the antiphlogistic regimen and emollient applications may be necessary.

Fallopius discovered this membrane, and gave it the name Hy'aloid. On a level with the entrance of the optic nerve into the eye, the hyaloid membrane has been described as forming, by reflection, a cylindrical canal, which pierces the vitreous humor from behind to before, as far as the posterior part of the crystalline. See Canal, hyaloid. At its anterior part is a depression—Fos'sa patella'ris seu lenticula'ris, hyaloidea seu vitrea — for the reception of the crystalline lens.

This name was long given to every encysted tumor which contained an aqueous and transparent fluid. Many pathologists subsequently applied it to vesicles, softer than the tissue of membranes, more or less transparent, which are developed within organs, but without adhering to their tissues. It is by no means clear that these formations are really entozoa. They have been found in various parts of the human body; sometimes in the uterus, occasioning signs nearly similar to those of pregnancy, but being sooner or later expelled. The expulsion is generally attended with more or less hemorrhage. See Acephalocyst.

A term generally applied to a collection of serous fluid in the areolar texture of the scrotum or in some of the coverings, either of the testicle or spermatic cord. To the first of these varieties the names — Exter'nal Hy'drocele, H. œdemato'des, (F.) H. par infiltration have been given; and to the second, those of Hydroce'lē inter'na, H. tu'nicæ vagina'lis tes'tis, Hydrel'ytron, (F.) H. par épanchement. When the collection occurs in the envelope of the testicle, it is called H. of the tu'nica vagina'lis; and the epithet congen'ital is added, Hydroce'lē congen'ita, when the interior of the membrane in which it is situate still communicates freely with the cavity of the abdomen. When it exists in the spermatic cord, it is called encyst'ed or diffu'sed Hy'drocele of the spermat'ic cord, Hydroce'lē cys'tica, Hydroce'lē funic'uli semina'lis, as the case may be. The tumor of the distended scrotum is oblong; greater below than above; indolent and semi-transparent. When it becomes inconveniently large, the fluid may be evacuated by puncturing with a trocar, but, as it collects again, this operation can only be considered palliative. The radical cure consists, usually, in injecting some irritating liquid through the canula of the trocar, which has been left in after puncturing. This is kept in the tunica vaginalis for a few minutes, and then withdrawn. The coat inflames, adhesion takes place, and the cavity is obliterated.

It commonly proves fatal before puberty.

Hydroceph'alus Congen'itus, see H. chronicus.

Hydroceph'alus Exter'nus, Œde'ma cap'itis, Cephalœde'ma of some, (F.) Hydrocéphalie externe, is a mere infiltration into the subcutaneous cellular tissue of the cranium. See Hydrocephalus chronicus.

It is observed particularly in childhood. Its march is extremely acute and often very rapid; admitting, generally, however, of division into three stages. The symptoms of the first stage are those of general febrile irritation, with headache, intolerance of light and sound, delirium, &c. Those of the second, which generally denote that the inflammation has ended in effusion, are, great slowness of pulse, crying out as if in distress, moaning, dilated pupil, squinting, &c.; and lastly, in the third stage — profound stupor, paralysis, convulsions, involuntary evacuations, quick pulse, and frequently death. The disease is of uncertain duration — sometimes destroying in two or three days, at others extending to two or three weeks. The prognosis is unfavorable. The treatment must be active during the stage of excitement, — precisely that which is necessary in phrenitis. In the second stage, the indication is — to promote the absorption of the effused fluid. This must be done by counterirritants, and mercury, chiefly. On dissection, water is generally found in the ventricles, or at the base of the brain; or there are evidences of previous vascular excitement, as effusions of coagulable lymph, &c.

When the effusion occurs suddenly, either primarily or secondarily in the course of some other disease, it has been termed, by the Germans, Wasserschlag, Water Stroke.

When concentrated, it is liquid, colorless, of a strong smell and taste, at first cool, afterwards burning. Its s. g. at 7° Centigrade, is 0·7058. It is very volatile, and enters into ebullition at 80° Fahr. It speedily undergoes decomposition, sometimes in less than an hour, and consists of a peculiar gaseous and highly inflammable compound of carbon and nitrogen, to which the name Cyan'ogen has been assigned; and of hydrogen, which acts as the acidifying principle: hence its name Hydrocyanic acid. In the Pharmacopœia of the United States (1873), two formulæ for the preparation of the Ac''idum hydrocyan'icum dilu'tum — Ac''idum hydrocyan'icum, Ph. U. S. of 1842 — are given; the one from the Ferrocyanide of Potassium; the other from the Cyanide of Silver. Both of these, as well as the Ac''idum hydrocyan'icum dilu'tum of the British Pharmacopœia (1867), contain two per cent. of the anhydrous acid. According to Magendie, the acid, prepared after Scheele's method — the one in common use—is of irregular medicinal power; he, therefore, recommends Gay Lussac's acid, diluted with six times its volume, or 8·5 times its weight of distilled water, for medicinal purposes, and this he calls Medic''inal Prussic Acid. Dr. Ure has proposed that the specific gravity should indicate that which is proper for medicinal exhibition; and, after experiments of the specific gravity of the acids obtained by different processes, he states that the acid, usually prescribed, is of s. g. 0·996 or 0·997. Great caution is, however, necessary. One drop of pure prussic acid may instantly destroy, and the animal show hardly any traces of irritability, a few moments after death. It has been advised in laryngeal phthisis, in pulmonary phthisis, pulmonary inflammation and irritation, dyspepsia, uterine affections, hectic cough, cancer, chronic rheumatism, and mania, and as a local remedy in impetiginous affections; but, although possessed of powerful sedative properties, it is so unmanageable and the preparation so uncertain, that it is not much used. The dose of Scheele's Acid, or of the Medicinal Prussic Acid, is from a quarter of a drop to two drops.

Hydrocys'tis, gen. Hydrocys'tidis, (hydro, and κυστις, 'a bladder.') A cyst containing a watery or serous fluid. A hydatid. Also, saccated ascites.

This gas, when breathed, proves fatal from containing no oxygen. When diluted with two-thirds of atmospheric air, it occasions some diminution of muscular power and sensibility, and a reduction of the force of the circulation. It has been respired in catarrh, hæmoptysis, and phthisis.

Hy'drogen, Binox'ide or Perox'ide of, Oxygenated water, is a combination of water with a mixing weight of oxygen. It is liquid, and very prone to decomposition. It is a powerful oxidizing agent, and has been given as an excitant in asphyxia, cholera, and narcotic poisoning; and in cachectic affections—cancer, diabetes, &c.; and externally in ulcers, chancre, diphtheritic sores, &c., probably by its oxidizing powers. A solution of the peroxide in ether, called Ozon'ic or O'zonized E'ther, was employed by Dr. B. W. Richardson, of London, with the view of oxidizing the sugar in the circulation, and causing its elimination through the lungs; but its efficacy is doubtful.

Hy'drogen, Carburet'ted, Inflam'mable air, Fire'damp, of miners, Marsh gas, (F.) Hydrogène carboné ou proto-carboné, Grisou, Gaz des marais, — obtained by passing the vapor of water over charcoal, at the temperature of ignition, in an iron tube — has been found possessed of properties like hydrogen, and has been used, diluted, in like cases. After an explosion of fire-damp in mines, there remains the after damp, choke damp, or black damp, consisting of carbonic acid and nitrogen, which occasions a greater loss of life, perhaps, than the explosion.

Hy'drogen, Perox'ide of, Hydrogen, binoxide of.

Hy'drogen, Sulph'uretted, Hydrosulph'uric, Sulphy'dric, Sulphhy'dric, Sulphohy'dric or Hydrothion'ic ac'id, Hydrothi'on, Gas hepat'icum seu hydrogen'ium sulphura'tum, Mephi'tis hepat'ica, (F.) Hydrogène sulfuré, Acide hydrosulfurique ou sulfhydrique, Air puant ou hépatique, may be disengaged from any of the sulphurets by the addition of a strong acid. It is a violent poison, but has been recommended to be inhaled, diluted, to allay the increased irritability which occasionally exists after diseases of the lungs. See Hydrosulphuretted water.

Hydrogène, Hydrogen — h. Carboné ou proto-carboné, Hydrogen, carburetted — h. Sulfuré, Hydrogen, sulphuretted.

The term Ra'bies is more appropriate for the aggregate of symptoms resulting from the bite of rabid animals. Hydrophobia literally signifies a 'dread of water;' and consequently, ought to be applied to one of the symptoms of rabies, rather than to the disease itself. It is a symptom which appears occasionally in other nervous affections. Rabies is susceptible of spontaneous development in the dog, wolf, cat, and fox, which can thence transmit it to other quadrupeds or to man; but it has not been proved that it can supervene — without their having been previously bitten — in animals of other species; or that the latter can, when bitten, communicate it to others. Many facts induce the belief that the saliva and bronchial mucus are the sole vehicles of the rabid virus; the effects of which upon the economy sometimes appear almost immediately after the bite, and are at others apparently dormant for a considerable period. The chief symptoms are — a sense of dryness and constriction of the throat; excessive thirst; difficult deglutition; aversion for, and horror at, the sight of liquids as well as of brilliant objects; red, animated countenance; great nervous irritability; frothy saliva; grinding of the teeth, &c. Death most commonly happens before the fifth day. Hydrophobia has hitherto resisted all therapeutical means. Those which allay irritation are obviously most called for. In the way of prevention, the bitten part should always be excised, where practicable, and cauterized.

In some cases, symptoms like those which follow the bite of a rabid animal are said to have come on spontaneously. This affection has been termed nervous, hysterical, or spontaneous hydrophobia.

In the former case, the iris is concave anteriorly, and pushed backwards:—in the latter, it is convex, and pushed forwards. Most commonly, the disease seems to depend on both humors at the same time. Hydrophthalmia sometimes affects both eyes; at others, only one. Children are more exposed to it than adults or old persons. The treatment must vary according to the cause; its longer or shorter duration; greater or less extent, &c. Hence, according to circumstances, hydragogue medicines, purgatives, general and local bloodletting, blisters, setons, moxa, cupping-glasses, fomentations, collyria, and fumigations of different kinds, have been employed. When all means fail, and the disease continues to make progress, the fluid may be evacuated by a puncture made with a cataract needle at the lower part of the transparent cornea.

Hydrop'sia, Hydrorrhœ'a, Hydror'rhoë, Hydror'rhoïs, Polyhy'dria, Hydrom'osus, Hydrou'sus, Drop'sy, Hy'dropsy,* (Old Eng.) Drop'yk, (F.) Hydropisie. A preternatural collection of a serous fluid in any cavity of the body or in the areolar texture. When the areolar texture of the whole body is more or less filled with fluid, the disease is called Anasar'ca or Leucophlegma'tia; —and when this variety is local or partial, it is called Œde'ma. The chief dropsies, designated from their seat, are:—Anasarca, Hydrocephalus, Hydrorachitis, Hydrothorax, Hydropericardium, Ascites, Hydrometra, Hydrocele, &c.

Encyst'ed Drop'sy, Hy'drops sacca'tus, incarcera'tus seu cyst'icus, is that variety in which the fluid is enclosed in a sac or cyst; so that it has no communication with the surrounding parts. Dropsy of the Ovarium, Hydrops seu Asci'tes Ova'rii, Asci'tes sacca'tus, is an instance of this variety.

Dropsy may be active or passive. The former consists in an increased action of the exhalants, so that those vessels pour out much more fluid than is absorbed; the latter arises from a state of atony of the absorbent vessels, which allows of an accumulation of fluid. It may also be mechanical, or produced by obstructions to the circulation, as in cases of diseased liver. Active dropsy, occurring accidentally in a sound individual, generally ends favorably. That which supervenes on other diseases, or is symptomatic of some internal affection, is rarely curable.

The treatment consists in the use of all those remedies which act on the various secretions; so that, the demand being increased, the supply will have to be increased accordingly; and in this manner some of the collected fluid may be taken up by the absorbents. To this end, bleeding if the dropsy be very active; purgatives, diuretics, sudorifics, sialagogues, &c., are the remedies chiefly depended upon.

It is congenital, and situate in the lumbar or sacral regions. It is almost always fatal — the tumor rupturing, and death occurring instantaneously. On dissection, a simple separation or complete absence of the spinous processes of the vertebræ is perceived, with, at times, destruction or absence of spinal marrow. The treatment is the same as in hydrocephalus chronicus; and, as in it, advantage seems occasionally to have been derived by puncturing with a fine needle.

It generally exists only on one side, which, if the fluid effused be considerable, projects more than the other. Dyspnœa, and fluctuation perceptible to the ear, are characteristic symptoms. When the chest is examined with the stethoscope, respiration is found to be wanting everywhere except at the root of the lung. The sound is also dull on percussion.

Effusion into the chest, as a result of inflammation of some thoracic viscus, is as common as the other is rare. It is usually a fatal symptom. It has been called symptomatic hydrothorax.

In hydrothorax, the course of treatment proper in dropsies in general must be adopted. Diuretics seem here to be especially useful; probably on account of the great activity of pulmonary absorption. Paracentesis can rarely be serviceable.

The semilunar, parabolic, or circular fold, situate at the outer orifice of the vagina in virgins, especially during youth and prior to menstruation. This membrane is ordinarily ruptured by the first venereal act, and is effaced by accouchement; some irregular flaps remaining, to which the name Carun'culæ Myrtifor'mes has been given by reason of their resemblance to the leaves of the myrtle. Many circumstances of an innocent character may occasion a rupture or destruction of this membrane. It is often, indeed, found absent in children soon after birth; while it may remain entire after copulation. Hence the presence of the hymen does not absolutely prove virginity; nor does its absence prove incontinence, although its presence would be primâ facie evidence of continence.

Johnson), Dragons (Mad. de Sevigné), (F.) Hypochondrie, Maladie imaginaire ou Anglaise, Affection Vaporeuse, Vapeurs, V. de Rate. This disease is probably so called, from the circumstance of some hypochondriacs having felt an uneasy sensation in the hypochondriac regions. The disease seems really to be, as Pinel has classed it, a species of neurosis, and of mental alienation, which is observed in persons who in other respects are of sound judgment, but who reason erroneously on whatever concerns their own health. Hypochondriasis is characterized by disordered digestion, without fever or local lesion; flatulence; borborygmi; extreme increase of sensibility; palpitations; illusions of the senses; a succession of morbid feelings, which appear to simulate the greater part of diseases; panics, exaggerated uneasiness of various kinds, chiefly in what regards the health, &c. Indigestion has usually been considered the cause of hypochondriasis. They are, unquestionably, much connected with each other; but there is every reason to believe that the seat of the affection is really, though functionally, in the brain. The disease almost always appears at the adult age, most commonly in irritable individuals; and in those exhausted, or rather in the habit of being exhausted, by mental labor, overwhelmed with domestic or public affairs, &c.

The treatment is almost entirely moral. The condition of the digestive functions must, however, be accurately attended to.

In abscesses of the chambers, the purulent matter is mixed with the aqueous humor, which it renders turbid; and is deposited particularly at the lower part of the eye; forming behind the cornea a kind of whitish crescent, that rises more or less before the pupil, and closes it entirely or in part. It requires the use of local and general antiphlogistics, and sorbefacients. At times, it is necessary to puncture the cornea and evacuate the pus.

In smell, and medical properties, it most resembles castor, which, according to Dr. Pappe, it may replace. It is used by the Cape farmers in nervous and spasmodic affections.

A species of neurosis, classed among the spasmi by Sauvages and Cullen, and in the Névroses de la génération, by Pinel. It received the name hysteria, because it was reputed to have its seat in the uterus, although Dr. Barnes has recently applied the name oophoria to it, under the belief that it is due to ovarian influences. It generally occurs in paroxysms; the principal characters of which consist in alternate fits of laughing and crying, with a sensation as if a ball — Bo'lus hyster'icus — ascends from the hypogastrium towards the stomach, chest, and neck, producing a sense of strangulation. If the attack be violent, there is, sometimes, loss of consciousness (although the presence of consciousness generally distinguishes hysteria from epilepsy), and convulsions. The duration of the attacks is very variable. It appears to be dependent upon irregularity of nervous distribution in very impressible persons, and is not confined to the female; for well-marked cases of hysteria are occasionally met with in men. During the fit,—dashing cold water on the face, stimulants applied to the nose, or exhibited internally, and antispasmodics, form the therapeutical agents. Exercise, tranquillity of mind, amusing and agreeable occupations, constitute the prophylactics. Trousseau has referred also to a chronic paroxysmal cough—hysterical cough—as of frequent occurrence in hysteria, which seems to be a convulsion of the muscles of the larynx and diaphragm, resembling the cough excited by inhalation of chlorine and other gases. See Mania, dancing.

It admits of various causes: in fact, anything which can directly or indirectly obstruct the course of the bile, so that it is taken into the mass of blood, produces the yellowness of surface; the bile being separated by the kidneys, causes yellowness of urine, and its being prevented from reaching the intestine occasions the pale-colored fæces. The prognosis, in ordinary cases, is favorable; — when complicated with hepatic disease, unfavorable. The treatment is simple:—an emetic or purgative, given occasionally so as to solicit the return of the bile to its ordinary channels: light tonics; unirritating diet; cheerful company, &c. A species of unsound mind, characterized by more or less complete obliteration of the intellectual and moral faculties. It may supervene on mania and melancholia, when it is termed Demen'tia, but more commonly it depends upon original conformation. It may also be symptomatic of organic disease of the brain, which has come on after birth. Idiotism exists in various degrees. Some idiots are mere automata, exhibiting scarcely any sensibility to external impressions; others are capable of articulating a few words, and possess certain mental emotions to a limited extent. Il'iac, Ili'acus, Il'ial, (F.) Iliaque, (from ilia.) Relating to, or connected with, the flanks.

Il'iac Ar'teries, Arte'riæ Ili'acæ. This term has been given to several arteries. The Pri'mary Iliacs, (F.) A. Iliaques primitives — A. Pelvicrurales (Ch.), arise from the bifurcation of the aorta, opposite the body of the fourth lumbar vertebra, and descend, in a divergent manner, until, opposite the sacro-iliac symphysis, they divide into two considerable trunks — the inter'nal Iliac or hypogastric (which see), and the exter'nal Iliac — Portion Iliaque de la crurale (Ch.). This proceeds from the sacro-iliac juncture as far as the crural arch, when it assumes the name Fem'oral Artery. Before passing under the arch it gives off two pretty considerable branches—the Epigas'tric, and the Circumflex'a Il'ii. This last, which is called also anterior Iliac by some anatomists — Circonflexe de l'Ilium (Ch.) — leaves the external iliac at the crural arch. It ascends along the outer edge of the iliacus muscle, and divides into two branches — an internal and an external.

The Ili'aca Inter'na Mi'nor seu Iliolumba'lis is a small artery, which sometimes arises from the hypogastric; at others, from the beginning of the gluteal. It is sent chiefly to the psoas and iliacus internus muscles.

Il'iac Crest, Cris'ta Il'ii, is the upper margin of the ilium, (F.) Crête Iliaque. It is very thick, and curved like the italic S. It affords attachment to the broad muscles of the abdomen.

Il'iac Fos'sæ are two in number — the internal, the depression presented by the ilium on its interior, and at the upper part in which the Iliacus internus is lodged; and the external, an excavation on the outer surface of the same bone, occupied by the Glutæi muscles.

Il'iac Mus'cle, Inter'nal, Ili'acus Inter'nus Mus'cle, Ili'acus, Iliaco-trochantérien (Ch.), Femur moven'tium sep'timus, Iliac muscle, is situate in the fossa iliaca, and at the anterior and superior part of the thigh. It is broad, radiated, triangular, and is attached, above, to the two upper thirds of the fossa iliaca, and to the internal part of the iliac crest; below, it terminates by a tendon, which is common to it and the psoas magnus, and is fixed into the lesser trochanter. When this muscle contracts, it bends the pelvis on the thigh, and conversely. It is also a rotator of the thigh outward, and prevents the trunk from falling backward. See Iliopsoas.

Il'iac Pas'sion, Ileus.

Il'iac Re'gions, Regio'nes ili'acæ, Inan'ia, are the sides of the abdomen between the ribs and the hips.

Il'iac Spines, Spi'nous Proc''esses of the Il'ium, are four in number. They are distinguished into anterior and posterior. Of the anterior, one is superior. It bounds the crista ilii anteriorly, and affords origin to the sartorius muscle. The other is inferior, and receives the tendinous origin of the rectus femoris.

The two Posterior Iliac Spines are divided, like the anterior, into superior and inferior. They afford insertion to strong ligaments, which unite the ilium with the sacrum.

(It was probably so called from its seeming to support the intestine ilion; or, perhaps, because its crest is curved upon itself, from ειλεω, 'I twist,' 'I roll.') This portion of the os innominatum is usually so called in the adult. The posterior surface is called Dorsum, the internal Venter. The upper semicircular edge is the Crista or Spine, at the anterior part of which is the anterior and superior spinous process; and, below, the anterior and inferior spinous process. At the back part of the spine are two spinous processes, the posterior and superior, and posterior and inferior. See Iliac spines.

Inflamma'tion, Inflamma'tio, so called in consequence of the acute or burning pain felt in a part affected with it. Phleg'monē, Phlogo'sis, Ecphlogo'sis, Epiphleg'ia, Exap'sis, Phlegma'sia, Causo'ma, Empres'ma, Phlo'gia, Hyperendosmose (Dutrochet), Incen'dium, Hyperhæmato'sis, Hyperæ'mia acti'va, Phleboplero'sis ecphrac'tica; (F.) Inflammation, improperly Angiite. Altered nutrition in a part is occasioned by some agency;— owing to which the blood flows into the capillary vessels in greater abundance than natural, and those vessels become over-dilated and enfeebled; whence result pain, redness, heat, tension, and swelling; symptoms which appear in greater or less severity, according to the structure, vital properties, and functions of the part affected, and its connection with other parts, as well as according to the individual constitution.

Simple accumulation of blood in the capillaries of the part is hyperæmia, not inflammation. The latter requires, in addition, altered nutrition of the vessels themselves, and the surrounding tissues.

The inflammations of the areolar and serous membranes greatly agree:—and those of the mucous and skin; the former being more active, and constituting the phlegmonous variety;—the latter, the erythematic or erysipelatous. Of this variety is the diffusive inflammation produced by morbid poisons,—as during dissection, where solutions of continuity exist in the fingers of the operator. It is seen, too, in workers in bone, and hence has been called bone fever. Inflammation may end by resolution, suppuration, gangrene, adhesion, effusion, or induration.

Besides the above inflammations, it has been considered, that there is an instinctive kind established for the union of parts which have been divided, whether the union takes place immediately, or by the aid of an intermediate body. This is the adhesive inflammation of some; but it may well be questioned whether inflammation is ever desirable in such cases. See Adhesion, Callus, Cicatrix. Broussais considered that the term inflammation should include every local exaltation of the organic movements which is sufficiently great to disturb the harmony of the functions, and disorganize the texture in which it is situate. He also extended the name to irritations which do not induce disorganization of textures, and which were previously, and are still, called fevers.

Inflammations have been variously named, according to their duration, intensity, local effects, &c., into acute, passive, chronic, asthenic, sthenic, ulcerative, gangrenous, diffuse, &c. Embolic inflammation is caused by the plugging of an artery by a detached portion of fibrin, or other substance driven into it by the action of the heart.

Examination of the blood drawn always exhibits an increase of the fibrinous element — the average proportion of which, in healthy blood, is about three in the thousand. In inflammation, it at times rises as high as ten. In fevers unaccompanied with inflammation, the proportion is natural, or below the average; but whenever inflammation supervenes, it immediately rises.

External inflammation is easily detected by the characters already mentioned:—internal, by disturbance of function and pain upon pressure: but the last sign is often not available. Both forms require the removal of all irritation, and the reduction of vascular excitement and nervous irritability by bloodletting — local and general — sedatives, refrigerants, counterirritants, &c.

Inflammation is not always of the active kind. There is a form, Inflamma'tio deb'ilis, which occurs in low conditions of the system, and in broken-down constitutions, which, like many forms of chronic inflammation, requires a stimulant, rather than a sedative, mode of treatment.

(For the numerous theories of inflammation, — such as the influence of the nervous system, the action of vessels, of cells, of embolism, of leucocytes, &c.,— treatment, &c., see the various recent standard works on the subject.)

Infundib'ulum, (in, and fundere, fusum, 'to pour.') A Fun'nel, Trito'rium, Choa'nē, Cho'nus, (F.) Entonnoir, of which various kinds are employed in pharmaceutical operations. A name given to many parts which, more or less, resemble a funnel. See Proventriculus, and Pulmo. It is particularly appropriated to the following organs:

Infundib'ulum of the Brain, Infundib'ulum seu Pel'vis seu Choa'na seu Cy'athus seu Scy'phus seu Con'cha seu Lacu'na seu Em'bolum seu Aquæduc''tus seu La'brum seu Concav'itas conchula'ris seu Proces'sus orbicula'ris Cer'ebri, (F.) Entonnoir du ventricule moyen du cerveau, Tige pituitaire, Tige sus-sphénoïdale. A depression in the inferior paries of the middle ventricle, above the pituitary gland. It was anciently regarded as a canal, by which the fluid collected in the ventricles of the brain was evacuated and poured into the nasal fossæ.

Infundib'ulum Cer'ebri, I. of the brain.

Infundib'ulum of the Coch'lea, I. Coch'leæ, Scy'phus Vieussen'ii seu audito'rius, Cucul'lus, Cana'lis scala'rum commu'nis. This, with the modiolus, forms the nucleus around which the gyri of the cochlea pass. It is an imperfect funnel, the apex of which is common with that of the modiolus, and the base is covered with the apex of the cochlea, termed Cu'pola.

In Surgery, infundibula or funnels are used to direct steam or vapors, to conduct the actual cautery to certain morbid parts, &c.

Infundib'ulum of the Eth'moid Bone, or of the Na'sal Fos'sæ. One of the anterior cells of that bone, which is broad and expanded above, and narrow below; opening, above, into the frontal sinus; below, into the anterior part of the middle meatus of the nasal fossæ.

Infundib'ulum of the Heart, Conus arteriosus — i. of the Kidney, see Calix — i. Lacrymale, Lachrymal sac.

In'guinal, Inguina'lis, (from inguen.) Belonging or relating to the groin. This epithet has been given to various parts met with in the region of the groin or inguinal region.

In'guinal Ar'tery is that portion of the femoral artery situate immediately beneath the crural arch in the inguinal region.

In'guinal Canal' is a canal, about two inches in length, proceeding obliquely downwards, inwards and forwards at the lower part of the abdomen; through which passes the spermatic cord in men, and the round ligament of the uterus in women. This canal is formed, inferiorly and anteriorly, by the aponeurosis of the greater oblique muscle; posteriorly by the fascia transversalis, which is joined to the preceding aponeurosis, and forms with it a deep channel, into which are received the lesser oblique and transversalis muscles. The inguinal canal has two apertures; the one, the lower and inner, is called the inguinal or abdominal ring. It is bounded by two strong tendinous pillars which fix it — the innermost to the symphysis, the outermost to the spine of the pubis. The upper and outer aperture, An'nulus abdomina'lis inte'rior, Apertu'ra inte'rior cana'lis inguina'lis, is formed by the fascia transversalis. From the edge of this aperture arises a membranous funnel, — a prolongation of the fascia transversalis,— which receives the spermatic vessels, forms their proper sheath, and accompanies them as far as the testicle. On its inside lies the epigastric artery. Above it is the lower edge of the transversalis muscle; and below, it is bounded by the channel of the greater oblique. By following the oblique direction of this canal, and passing, consequently, on the outside of the epigastric artery, the viscera are displaced, so as to constitute internal inguinal hernia.

In'guinal Glands, Gland'ulæ inguina'les, (F.) Glandes inguinales, are the lymphatic glands or ganglions of the groin. There are two sets, one superficial; the other deep-seated; the former are larger, and their number varies, but on the average there are eight or ten which are placed irregularly about Poupart's ligament. The latter, or deep-seated, are situate behind the others around the femoral artery and vein.

In'guinal Her'nia, see Bubonocele, and Hernia.

In'guinal Re'gion, Re'gio inguina'lis, Bu'bo, In'guen. The region of the groin.

In'guinal Ring, Abdom'inal Ring, An'nulus abdom'inis seu abdomina'lis exte'rior, Apertu'ra exte'rior cana'lis inguina'lis, (F.) Anneau Inguinal, is the inferior aperture of the inguinal canal.

In'guinocuta'neus. A name given by Chaussier to the middle ramus of the anterior branch of the first lumbar nerve, because it sends its numerous filaments to the groin, scrotum, and to the skin of the superior part of the thigh.

Disorders of the inhibitory nerves — cardiac, respiratory, intestinal, and reflex — have been termed inhibitory or restraint' neuro'ses. A nervous twig, separating from the vagus at the level of the thyroid cartilage, in the rabbit and cat, and terminating in the inferior cervical ganglion, is a depressor nerve of the heart. The most common injections are made of soot, wax, and turpentine, colored with lampblack, vermilion, &c. There are three kinds chiefly used by anatomists,—the coarse, the fine, and the minute. The finest injections for histological researches are made with ether as a menstruum.

Interclavic'ular Lig'ament is a fibrous bundle, placed transversely above the extremity of the sternum, between the heads of the two clavicles. This ligament is flat. Its fibres, which are always longer above than below, are separated by small apertures, which are traversed by vessels. It prevents the separation of the two clavicles in the forced depression of the shoulder.

There is constantly, however, a supe'rior, Arte'ria intercosta'lis supe'rior seu Intercosta'lis subcla'via, which is given off from the posterior part of the subclavian, and which sends branches into the first two or three intercostal spaces; and, generally, eight or nine inferior or aortic intercostals. These arise from the lateral and posterior parts of the pectoral aorta, and ascend obliquely in front of the vertebral column, to gain the intercostal spaces, where they divide into a dorsal branch and an intercostal, properly so called.

Intercos'tal Mus'cles are distinguished into internal,—inter-plévrocostaux of Dumas,—and external. The former are inserted into the inner lip, the latter into the outer lip of the edge of the ribs. The fibres of the external intercostals are directed obliquely downwards and forwards; and those of the internal downwards and backwards. Both are inspiratory and expiratory muscles, according as they take their origin on the upper or lower rib. Some small, fleshy fibres, seen occasionally at the inner surface of the thorax, descending obliquely from one rib to another, have been called Infracostales, (F.) Souscostaux.

Intercos'tal Space, Interval'lum seu Interstit''ium intercosta'lē, Mesopleu'rum, Mesopleu'rium, is the interval which separates one rib from that immediately above or below it.

Intercos'tal Veins are distinguished like the arteries. The right superior intercostal vein is often wanting. When it exists, it opens into the back part of the subclavian. The same vein of the left side is very large. It communicates with the demi-azygos, receives the left bronchial vein, and opens into the corresponding subclavian. The right inferior intercostal veins open into the vena azygos; and those of the left into the demi-azygos.

INTERMIT'TENT FE'VER, Fe'bris intermit'tens, Dialeip'yra, Intermittens, Au'etus, Pyretotypo'sis, A'gue, Ague and Fe'ver, Fever and Ague, Paln'dal or Period'ic Fever, (PROV.) Agah, Cold chill, Sha'king, Shakes, (Old Eng.) Ak'sis, Auggere, Axes, (F.) Fièvre intermittente, F. d'accès, F. des marais, F. périodique, is a fever consisting of paroxysms, with a complete state of apyrexia in the intervals. The chief types are Quotid'ian, Ter'tian, and Quart'an. The symptoms of intermittents are those of a decided and completely marked cold stage, or Stage of Concentra'tion, (F.) Stade de froid, attended with paleness; collapse; impaired sensibility; and coldness, more or less diffused, followed by general rigors. After this occurs the hot stage, or stage of expansion, (F.) Stade de la chaleur, the heat returning partially and irregularly, and at length becoming universal, and much above the standard of health. The pulse is now hard and strong; tongue white: urine, high-colored: thirst, considerable. At length, the sweat'ing stage, or stage of termina'tion, (F.) Stade de sueur, makes its appearance; the moisture usually beginning on the forehead, face, and neck, and soon extending universally; the heat abating; thirst ceasing; the urine throwing down a sediment, and the functions being gradually restored to their wonted state. The tertian type is the most common, and the quartan the most severe. The quotidian more readily changes into a remittent and continued fever. The quartan has, generally, the longest cold stage, the tertian the longest hot. The chief exciting cause is marsh miasmata, the malaria of the Italians, sometimes called A'gue poi'son. Ague, also, occurs in districts where there are no marshy emanations. Such districts are, generally, of a volcanic nature: — further we know not. When the disease has once attacked an individual, it is apt to recur. The prognosis is, in general, favorable, as far as regards life; but long protracted intermittents are apt to induce visceral obstructions and engorgements, which may end in dropsy. In some countries, the disease is of a very pernicious character. The indications of treatment are, 1. To abate the violence of the paroxysm; and, 2. To prevent its return. The first indication demands the adoption of the general principles and remedies required in ordinary fever. The second is the most important. The period of apyrexia is that for action. The means for fulfilling this indication are: — the use of emetics, purgatives, antiperiodics, as cinchona, quinia, &c., arsenic, and forcible impressions made on the mind of the patient.

Interos'seous Ar'teries of the Forearm and Hand. Of these there are several. The common interosseous artery arises from the posterior part of the ulnar, a little below the bicipital tuberosity of the radius; passes backward, and divides into two branches; the one called anterior interosseous descends vertically, anterior to the interosseous ligament; the other, called posterior interosseous, passes above the ligament, appears at its posterior part, and divides into two great branches — the posterior recurrent radial and the posterior interosseous, properly so called. In the hand — 1. The dorsal metacarpal interosseous arteries are given off by the dorsalis carpi, a division of the radial artery. 2. The palmar interosseous arteries, which arise from the convexity of the deep palmar arch, and give off the middle interosseous arteries. 3. The dorsal interosseous of the index, proceeding directly from the radial artery. In the foot, are distinguished — 1. The dorsal interosseous arteries, three in number, which arise from the artery of the metatarsus, a branch of the dorsalis tarsi. 2. The plantar interosseous arteries, which are also three in number, and arise from the plantar arch.

Interos'seous Lig'aments. Ligaments seated between certain bones, which they unite; such are the ligaments between the radius and ulna, and between the tibia and fibula.

Interos'seous Mus'cles. These occupy the spaces between the bones of the metacarpus and metatarsus, and consequently belong, some to the hand, others to the foot.

These muscles are seven in number — two for each of the three middle fingers, and one for the little finger. Four are situate on the back of the hand, and three only in the palm. They are inserted into the metacarpal bones, and send a tendon to the tendon of the extensor communis. According to their office, they are, to each finger, an adductor and an abductor. The index has a dorsal abductor and a palmar one. The middle finger has two dorsal muscles for adductor and abductor, the ring finger has a dorsal adductor and a palmar abductor, and the little finger has only one interosseous abductor, which is palmar. These muscles produce abduction and adduction of the fingers, which they can also extend, owing to their connection with the extensor tendons.

Interos'seus Pe'dis, Métatarso-phalangien-latéral (Ch.). The number, arrangement, shape, and uses of these are the same as in the case of the preceding muscles. Four are dorsal, and three plantar; six belong to the three middle toes, and one to the little toe. The great toe is devoid of them. As in the hand, they are distinguished, in each toe, into abductor and adductor.

of two kinds. The one (Muscle grand épineux du dos of Winslow) representing fleshy bundles of different lengths, applied upon the lateral surfaces of the spinous processes, from the third dorsal vertebra to the second lumbar. The other (Muscle petit épineux du dos, Winslow), covered by the preceding. They are situate on each side of the interspinal ligament, in the form of small, short, flat bundles, which pass from one spinous process to the second, third, or fourth above it. These muscles aid in extending the vertebral column, and incline it a little to one side when they act on one side only.

In'terstice, Interstit''ium, Aræo'ma, (inter, and sistere, 'to place,') Diaste'ma, Interval'lum. Anatomists have given this name to the intervals between organs. These are small, muscular bundles; quadrilateral; thin and flat; situate, in pairs, in the intervals between the transverse processes of the neck, except between the first and second, where there is only one. They are distinguished into anterior and posterior. The former are six in number; the latter five. These muscles bring the transverse processes of the neck nearer each other, and contribute to the lateral flexion of the neck.

Intertransversa'les Lumbo'rum, Mus'culi intertransver'si lumbo'rum, (F.) Intertransversaires des lombes. These are almost entirely fleshy, and ten in number; five on each side. They are similar to the preceding in general arrangement; except that they are more marked, and not placed in two rows. Each intertransverse space contains only one. They are quadrilateral and flat. The first occupies the space between the transverse processes of the first lumbar and the last dorsal vertebræ; and the last is between that of the fourth and fifth lumbar vertebræ. These muscles incline the lumbar region laterally; and straighten it when inclined to one side. One set of these muscles, intertransversales media'les seu interaccesso'rii, passes from the accessory process of one vertebra to the mammillary process of the next.

In man, its length is six or eight times that of the body. It is divided into two principal portions, called small intestine and large intestine. The former, Intesti'num ten'uë, I. grac''ilë seu angus'tum, Aræ'a, (F.) Intestin grêle, constituting nearly four-fifths of the whole length, begins at the stomach and terminates in the right iliac region. It is divided into duodenum, jejunum, and ileum. Some anatomists give the name small intestine to the last two only; Jejunoïl'eum, Intesti'num mesenteria'lë, which are kept in place by the mesentery, and form a large paquet, occupying the umbilical and hypogastric regions, a part of the flanks, of the iliac regions, and of the cavity of the pelvis. It is composed of, 1. A serous membrane, which is peritoneal. 2. Of a muscular coat, whose fibres are very pale, and are placed, in part, longitudinally; but the greater part transversely. 3. Of a whitish, mucous membrane; villous, and forming folds or valves — valvulæ conniventes — at its inner surface, and furnished with a number of mucous follicles, called glands of Lieberkühn, crypts or follicles of Lieberkühn, and in the duodenum with the glands of Brunner. 4. An areolar or submucous coat, of loose texture, supporting the mucous membrane. The arteries of the small intestine proceed from the superior mesenteric; its veins open into the vena porta. Its nerves proceed from the superior mesenteric plexus. The large intestine, Intesti'num cras'sum seu am'plum, Megalocæ'lia, (F.) Gros intestin, forms a sequence to the small. It is much shorter, and is solidly attached in the regions of the abdomen which it occupies. It begins in the right iliac region; ascends along the right flank, till beneath the liver, when it crosses the upper part of the abdomen, descends into the left iliac fossa, and plunges into the pelvic cavity, to gain the anus. The great intestine is usually divided into three portions, — the cæcum, colon, and rectum. It receives its arteries from the superior and inferior mesenteries. Its veins open into the vena porta. Its nerves are furnished by the mesenteric plexuses. Its lymphatic vessels, which are much less numerous than those of the small intestine, pass into the ganglions or glands seated between the different reflections of the peritoneum, which fix it to the abdominal parietes. The use of the intestines is,—in the upper part, to effect the chylification of the food and the absorption of the chyle; — in the lower, to serve as a reservoir, where the excrementitious portion of the food collects; and, also, as an excretory duct, which effects its expulsion.

B., 1867), Io'dium, Io'nium, Io'num, (F.) Iode, (ιωδης, viola'ceus, 'of a violet color;' so called from the violet vapor it exhales when volatilized.) It is contained in the mother waters of certain fuci, and is obtained by pouring an excess of concentrated sulphuric acid on the water obtained by burning different fuci, lixiviating the ashes and concentrating the liquor. The mixture is placed in a retort to which a receiver is attached, and is boiled. The iodine passes over and is condensed. It is solid, in the form of plates; of a bluish gray color, of a metallic brightness, and smell similar to that of the chloride of sulphur. Its s. g. is 4·946. When heated, it becomes volatilized, and affords the vapor which characterizes it. With oxygen it forms Iod'ic acid, and with hydrogen Hydriod'ic acid. The tincture of iodine and the iodides have been employed with great success in the treatment of goitre and of some scrofulous affections. It must be administered in a very small dose and for a long period. It is said to be apt, however, to induce cholera morbus, signs of great nervous irritability, Iodom'ethē, (F.) Ivresse iodique, and emaciation of the mammæ. When these symptoms, collectively termed I'odism, Iodo'sis, and Iodin'ia, (F.) Cachexie iodée, are urgent, the dose may be diminished, or it may be wholly discontinued, and afterwards resumed. When exposed to the air in a room, it has been found an effective antibromic.

Obtained by adding to an alcoholic solution of iodide of potassium, chlorinated lime, the resulting iodate of lime being separated from the iodoform by the addition of boiling alcohol. Besides the medical properties of iodine, which render it useful in scrofula, syphilis, &c., anodyne and anæsthetic effects have been ascribed to it. It is also used externally in the form of ointment. It is in crystalline plates, of a beautiful citrine color; and may be given in the same cases as iodine and the iodides. Dose, one grain, three times a day. See Carbonis sesquiiodidum.

I'ris, gen. I'ridis, (ιρις, gen. ιριδος,) Gram'mē. So called from its resembling the rainbow in a variety of colors. A membrane stretched vertically at the anterior part of the eye, in the midst of the aqueous humor, in which it forms a kind of circular, flat partition, separating the anterior from the posterior chamber. It is perforated by a circular opening called the pupil, which is constantly varying its dimensions, owing to the varying contractions of the fibres of the iris. Its posterior surface has been called uvea, from the thick black varnish which covers it. The pigmentary stratum, on its free surface, appears to be bounded by a delicate, but sharply defined, line, which has been described as a special membrane—Membra'na pigmen'ti seu lim'itans seu lim'itans Paci'ni seu Jaco'bi Ar'nold seu Zin'nii. The greater circumference of the iris is adherent to the ciliary processes and circle. It has an external plane of radiated fibres, Dilata'tor i'ridis, and an internal one of circular fibres, Sphinc'ter pupil'læ seu i'ridis, which serve — the one to dilate, the other to contract the aperture of the pupil. The iris receives the ciliary nerves. Its arteries are furnished by the long ciliary arteries, which form two circles by their anastomoses—the one very broad, near the great circumference; the other, smaller, and seated around the circumference of the pupil. The veins of the iris empty themselves into the Vasa vorticosa, and into the long ciliary veins. The use of the iris seems to be, — to regulate by its dilatation or contraction, the quantity of luminous rays necessary for distinct vision. The different colors of the iris occasion the variety in the colors of the human eye. See Membrana pupillaris.

The rhizoma of this plant is extremely acrid in its recent state; and, when chewed, excites a pungent heat in the mouth, that continues for several hours. When dried, the acrimony is lost, or nearly so, and the smell is very agreeable. It is indebted to its agreeable flavor for its retention in the pharmacopœias, although it is ranked as an expectorant. I'RIS VULGA'RIS, I. Germanica.

Irisi'tis, Iritis.

Iri'tis, Inflamma'tion of the i'ris, Inflamma'tio i'ridis, Irisi'tis, Iridi'tis, (iris, and itis,) Uvei'tis of some. The chief symptoms are :—change in the color of the iris; fibres less movable; teeth-like processes shooting into the pupil; pupil irregularly contracted, with the ordinary signs of inflammation of the eye. If the inflammation does not yield, suppuration takes place; and although the matter may be absorbed, the iris remains immovable. When the iritis results from syphilis, gonorrhœa, rheumatism, gout, or scrofula, it requires specific treatment, according to its cause. The general principles of treatment are, to deplete largely and exhibit mercury freely ; along with attention to other means advisable in ophthalmia. The free use of quinia is sometimes serviceable. When the inflammation is seated in the serous covering of the iris, it is termed Iri'tis sero'sa. When the iritis is marked by a tendency to new formation, which may become developed into a pseudo-membrane, it is called plastic iritis.

Kid'ney, (etymology uncertain; Serenius derives it fancifully from Su. Goth. qued, the belly; and nigh, [quasi, quidney],) Ren, Neph'ros, (Sc.) Neir, Nere, (F.) Rein. The kidneys or reins are the secretory organs of the urine. They are two glands, situate deeply—the one on the right, and the other on the left side — in the hypochondres; at the sides of the lumbar vertebræ; behind the peritoneum; and in the midst of an abundant, fatty areolar tissue, Tu'nica seu Cap'sula adipo'sa. The kidney is of a reddish-brown color; oval form; and flattened on two surfaces. It has, at its internal margin, a deep fissure, by which the renal vessels and nerves enter or quit the organ, and the ureter issues. It resembles, pretty accurately, the haricot or kidney bean. Two substances are readily distinguishable in it; — the outer, secern'ing, cort'ical, glan'dular or vas'cular, Substan'tia cortica'lis seu glandulo'sa seu vasculo'sa seu glomerulo'sa seu rubicun'da, Cor'tex re'nis, which secretes the urine; and the inner, tu'bular, med'ullary, urinif'erous, conoid'al or ra'diated, Substan'tia medulla'ris seu tubulo'sa seu fibro'sa seu inter'na seu cinerit''ia, Medul'la re'nis, which appears under the form of small cones or unequal papil'læ or mammil'læ, each resulting from the union of small capillary tubes, adherent by one of their extremities to the cortical substance; and opening, by the other, at the summit of the cone, into ca'lices, a species of membranous tubes, more or less numerous, which transmit the urine of the papillæ to the pelvis. Between the tubules and vessels of the kidney is the intertu'bular stro'ma, especially in the cortical substance and towards the apices of the papillæ, in very young human beings or in other animals. By the pelvis is meant a small, membranous sac, of an irregularly oval shape, at the base of which are the orifices of the calices, and the other extremity of which is continuous with the ureter. The kidney is surrounded by a fibrous membrane proper to it, Perineph'rus, Tu'nica pro'pria seu albugin'ea. It has been shown by Mr. Bowman and others that the renal artery is distributed to the corpora Malpighiana, forming a pellet of convolutions, which is received into a flask-like dilatation of the ureter — Bow'man's Cap'sule, and through which —it is conceived — the watery portion of the urine is separated. The blood then becomes venous, and is distributed by different veins — portal veins of the kidney — to the convoluted tubes through which the proper urine is secreted. Hence the blood passes into the renal vein. The intermediate vessels between the Malpighian bodies and the convoluted tubes have been termed the Por'tal Sys'tem of the Kid'ney. See Ferrein, pyramids of, Corpora Malpighiana, &c.

Kid'ney, Bright's Disease of the, Mor'bus Bright'ii seu albuminen'sis seu granulo'sus Re'num, Nephri'tis albumino'sa seu socia'ta, Neph'ria, Albuminu'ria, Nephrochaluzo'sis, Nephrococco'sis, Uroze'mia albumino'sa, Cachec'tic or Asso'ciated nephri'tis, Cachex'ia Rena'lis, Inflamma'tion of the Malpig'hian cor'puscles, Disease of Bright, Gran'ular Degenera'tion or Disorganiza'tion of the Kidney, Gran'ular Kidney of Bright, Cachec'tic nephri'tis, Chala'zonephri'tis, (F.) Maladie ou mal de Bright, Néphrite albumineuse, État Granuleux ou Dégenérescence granulée du Rein, Albuminurorrhée. Bright's disease was formerly defined as a granular disease of the cortical part of the kidney, characterized by the secretion of urine that contains albumen and is of less specific gravity than natural, and which destroys by inducing other diseases. It was first described by Dr. Richard Bright, of London. By some it is made to include only one particular form of renal disease, in which the tubules are inflamed, tu'bal nephritis. By others, it includes parenchymatous nephritis, interstitial nephritis and amyloid or lardaceous degeneration. Under this head are now included, according to the nomenclature adopted by the Royal College of Physicians of London, all diseases of the kidney productive of albuminuria. Two forms have been described, the acute and chronic, different varieties of which have been referred to by writers on the subject.

Acute Bright's disease, variously called Acute tu'bal or desquam'ative nephritis, Acute albuminu'ria, Acute re'nal drop'sy, is an affection of the epithelial or gland cells lining the urinary tubuli, the cells becoming atrophied and disintegrated, and by their desquamation blocking up the tubes; the renal circulation becomes obstructed, the kidneys are congested, serum and fibrin are effused, the former causing an albuminous condition of the urine, while the fibrin, having the broken-down cells entangled with it, passes off in the urine in epithelial tube-casts. When there is no such desquamative process, it is called non-desquamative disease of the kidney.

Under Chron'ic Bright's disease, Chronic albuminu'ria, Mor'bus Bright'ii lon'gus, Albuminu'ria lon'ga, authors describe: 1. Gran'ular Kid'ney, also called contrac'ted gran'ular, gout'y or cirrhot'ic kid'ney, chron'ic desquàm'ative nephri'tis, a disease characterized by albuminous urine, persistent desquamation of epithelium, atrophy of the kidney, granular epithelial casts, seen in the urine on microscopic examination, &c. 2. Fat'ty Kid'ney, or Fatty Degenera'tion of the Kidney, seen either in its enlarged form as the mot'tled kid'ney, or with contraction of the organ. It may occur as the result of acute desquamative nephritis. 3. Larda'ceous, Am'yloid or Wax'y Kidney, which usually occurs in connection with constitutional affections, such as phthisis, scrofulous abscess, constitutional syphilis, &c., and is characterized by the form of infiltration known as the lardaceous or waxy. See Lardaceous. (For tests for Albumen in the Urine, see Urine, examination of.)

In one the foot, instead of resting on the soil by the whole plantar surface, touches it only with the metatarsophalangian articulations. It seems as if turned backwards and broken upon the leg, (Pes seu Tal'ipes Equi'nus, Hip'opus, Oxypod'ia, Tip'foot, Horse'foot.) In other cases the foot is twisted inwards, (Va'rus, Tal'ipes varus, Blæsop'odes, Blæsop'us, Cyllo'epus, Cyllop'oda, Cyllopod'ion, Lo'ripes, Cross'foot, (F.) Cagneux,) so that it rests only on the ground on its outer edge; or it may be twisted outwards, (Val'gus, Tal'ipes Valgus, Out'bow foot,) or rest only on its inner edge, or on the back part of the heel, (Talipes calca'neus, Heel club'foot.) In the flat'foot or splay'foot, Duck'foot, Pes pla'nus, Splat'foot, Tal'ipes equi'no-val'gus, Spuri'ous Val'gus, Sar'apus, Plat'ypus, Platypod'ia, (F.) Pied plat, the plantar surface of the foot is flattened instead of being concave.

These deformities are rarely accidental. They are almost always congenital, and may be rectified, at an early period, by proper mechanical means to strengthen the foot gradually, and restore it to its proper shape and direction; and if these means fail, the tendons and muscles concerned in the deformity may be divided. A similar affection of the hand is called Club-hand, Ma'nus cur'ta, (F.) Main bot.

Club or clubbed fingers are also met with, and a condition of the penis has been described, which has received the name of club or clubbed penis. See Penis.

Land's End, Cli'mate of. The climate of the Land's End, in England, resembles that of the south of Devonshire, but is more relaxing. Larynge'al or Laryn'geal, Larynge'us, (F.) Laryngé, Laryngien, (from larynx.) That which belongs to the larynx.

Larynge'al Ar'teries are given off from the thyroid arteries.

Larynge'al Nerves, (F.) Nerfs Laryngés, are two in number—a superior and an inferior. The superior laryngeal nerve is given off from the trunk of the pneumogastric, at the upper and deep part of the neck. It passes downwards and inwards, behind the internal carotid artery, and divides into two secondary branches; the one, external, which distributes its filaments, on the outside of the larynx, to the sternothyroid, hyothyroid, constrictor inferior, cricothyroid muscles, &c. The other, the internal, which crosses the thyrohyoid membrane, and gives filaments to the epiglottis, the mucous membranes of the pharynx and larynx, to the arytenoid gland; the arytenoid and cricothyroid muscles, and ultimately intermingles with the inferior laryngeal nerve. The inferior laryngeal nerves or recurrents, Nervi reversi'vi, Rameaux trachéaux, (Ch.) arise from the trunk of the pneumogastric within the thorax. They ascend in the furrow, which separates the trachea from the œsophagus, to be distributed on the neck, after having been reflected — the left around the arch of the aorta; the right around the corresponding subclavian. They send off filaments to the cardiac plexuses; to the parietes of the œsophagus and trachea; to the thyroid gland; to the inferior constrictor of the pharynx; the posterior and lateral cricoarytenoid and thyroarytenoid muscles; and to the mucous membrane of the pharynx and larynx.

Larynge'al Phthi'sis, Phthisis, laryngeal.

Larynge'al Pouch'es. Small culs-de-sac, which lead from the anterior part of each ventricle of the larynx upwards, for the space of half an inch, between the superior ligaments on the inner side and the thyroid cartilage on the outer, reaching as high as the upper border of that cartilage at the sides of the epiglottis. Numerous small glands open into them.

This disease, in some measure, resembles croup; but is usually devoid of that peculiar sonorous inspiration which attends the latter. There is, also, pain upon pressing the larynx; and, while laryngitis is a disease of more advanced life, croup attacks children. The membraniform exudation is, also, absent; probably because the inflammation being seated above the glottis, the coagulable lymph is readily expectorated. It requires the most active treatment. Various forms of laryngitis have been described, such as Catar'rhal laryngitis, acute and chronic; Chron'ic glan'dular laryngitis, or Follic'ular disease of the lar'ynx, — the Dyspho'nia clerico'rum or Cler'gymen's sorethroat; Phthis'ical laryngitis, or Laryngæ'al phthi'sis, Diffuse cellular laryngitis, Acute œdem'atous laryngitis, Gout'y laryngitis, &c.

Simple Laryngitis is called by some mu'cous Laryngitis, Laryngitis acu'ta seu muco'sa acu'ta, (F.) Laryngite muqueuse, to distinguish it from submucous Laryngitis or Œdema of the glottis.

Chron'ic Laryngitis is generally regarded as synonymous with laryngeal phthisis; but it may exist independently.

It is composed of four cartilages,—the thyroid, cricoid, and two arytenoid; is moved by a number of muscles, and lined by a mucous membrane, having certain membranous reflections, constituting the superior and the inferior ligaments of the glottis, &c.

The superior or pharyngeal opening of the larynx is called Os'tium pharynge'um seu Ad'itus laryn'gis, Orific''ium supe'rius laryn'gis, Hyperglot'tis, Ri'ma hyperglot'tica, and Fissu'ra laryngæ'a pharyn'gis.

The larynx is destined to give passage to the air, in the act of respiration, and to impress upon it certain modifications, which constitute voice. Its dimensions vary in different individuals. In men, it is always larger, and situate lower, than in women.

Lep'ra, Lep'ira, (λεπρος, 'scaly,') Lepido'sis, Lepri'asis, Lepro'sis, Lepros'itas, Vitili'go, Lep'ra Græco'rum, Her'pes furfura'ceus circina'tus, Lep'rosy, Leap'ery, (Sc.) Lepyr, Lipper, (F.) Lèpre, Mal Saint-Main, Dartre furfuracée arrondie. This term has been applied to various affections, very different in character. 1. To the Leprosy of the Jews, East'ern Lep'rosy, Leu'cē, Lepido'sis, Lepri'asis canes'cens, Lep'ra Mosa'ica seu Hebræo'rum, — a variety of the Al'phos or Lep'ra alphoï'des. The leuce was, generally, not scaly, but consisted of smooth, shining patches, on which the hair turned white and silky, and the skin, with the muscular flesh, lost its sensibility. It was incurable. 2. To the Elephantiasis or Lep'ra of the A'rabs, see Elephantiasis; and, 3. To the Lep'ra of the Greeks, which includes all the varieties met with at the present day. It is characterized by scaly patches of different sizes, but having always nearly a circular form. Bateman and Willan describe three chief varieties of this lepra.

1. Lep'ra alphoï'des, Lepido'sis Lepri'asis al'bida, Al'phos, Morphæ'a al'ba, Vitili'go al'phus, Al'baras al'ba, Al'baræs, Al'baros, Lèpre écailleuse of Alibert, White lep'rosy, Al'phous Disease. An affection, characterized by white patches, surrounded by a rose-colored areola, which appears here and there on the surface; depressed in the middle. A blotchy, and not dangerous form of the disease, common at the present day in Arabia, is termed Baras. Under a more hideous form, called Djedam, the joints swell, then sluggish and spreading ulcers form, causing frightful sores on various parts of the body, and death gradually supervenes.

2. Lep'ra ni'gricans seu me'las seu maculo'sa ni'gra, Vitili'go me'las seu ni'gra, Morphæ'a seu Al'baras ni'gra, Me'las, Lepido'sis lepri'asis nigricans, Black leprosy, in which the scales are livid; the size of half a dollar; and diffused over the body, but less widely than in the Alphoï'des. The French pathologists usually admit three species of lepra, to which they give the epithets scaly (squameuse), crustaceous (crustacée), and tubercular (tuberculeuse), according as the skin may be covered with scales, crusts, or tubercles.

3. Lep'ra vulga'ris, Lepido'sis lepri'asis vulga'ris, Dartre furfuracée arrondie of Alibert, Boak, characterized as follows: scales glabrous, whitish, size of a crown piece; preceded by smaller reddish and glossy elevations of the skin, encircled by a dry, red, and slightly elevated border; often confluent; sometimes covering the whole of the body except the face.

When associated with syphilis, Lepra is called Syphilit'ic lepra, L. syphilit'ica.

Lepra appears to be endemic in Egypt, in Java, and certain parts of Norway and Sweden. Imperfect and faulty nutriment seems to contribute to its development. The means, best adapted for its removal, are:—a mild, unirritating diet, emollient fomentations—sulphureous baths, fumigations, &c.; but, often, all remedial agents will be found ineffectual. Other forms of lepra have been described, as L. Puncta'ta, L. Gutta'ta, L. Nummula'ris, L. Inveterа'ta, L. Diffu'sa, &c.

Leucoma* and Albugo are often used synonymously to denote a white opacity of the cornea. Both are essentially different from nebula of the cornea; nebula being usually the result of chronic ophthalmia and an effusion of a milky serum into the texture of the delicate continuation of the conjunctiva over the cornea: — the others are the result of violent, acute ophthalmia. In this state, a thick, coagulable lymph is extravasated from the arteries, sometimes superficially, at other times deeply into the substance of the cornea. On other occasions, the disease consists of a firm, callous cicatrix on this membrane, — the effect of a wound or ulcer with loss of substance. The affection is more difficult of cure in proportion to its duration and to the age of the individual; the activity of the absorbents being greater in youth. If inflammation still exist, antiphlogistics must be persevered in, and, afterwards, gentle stimulants be used to excite absorption; along with the internal use of mercury or iodine.

Leva'tor Scap'ulæ seu An'guli Scap'ulæ, Eleva'tor scap'ulæ, E. seu Mus'culus Patien'tiæ, Angula'ris, Leva'tor pro'prius scap'ulæ, (F.) Trachéloscapulaire, (Ch.) Angulaire de l'omoplate, Releveur de l'omoplate. This muscle is so called because it is attached to the upper and internal angle of the scapula. It is situate at the posterior and lateral part of the neck, and at the upper part of the back. It is long, flat, and broader above than below. In this latter direction, it is inserted into the superior internal angle of the scapula; and in the former, into the tops of the transverse processes of the first four cervical vertebræ. It depresses the prominence of the shoulder by raising the posterior angle of the scapula, on which it impresses a kind of rotary motion. It can, also, draw the head to one side.

Leva'tor Pro'prius Scap'ulæ, Levator scapulæ.

Leva'tor Ure'thræ, (F.) Releveur de l'Uréthre. Santorini describes under this name a portion of the transversus perinæi muscle.

Le'ver, (from levare, 'to lift up,') Vec'tis, Moch'lus, Porrec'tum. An inflexible rod, turning round a fixed point, and used for moving bodies, bearing burdens, or raising them. The point on which the lever moves is called the Ful'crum Hypomoch'lion. The force which moves the lever is called the power; and the weight to be moved the resistance. There are three kinds of levers. A lever of the first kind has the fulcrum between the power and resistance. A lever of the second kind has the resistance between the fulcrum and power: whilst a lever of the third kind has the power between the fulcrum and resistance. In the locomotive system of the human body, we have examples of all the three kinds. The bones represent levers; the muscles of locomotion are powers; the weight of parts to be moved constitutes the resistance. The fulcra are, at times, the joints; at others, the ground, &c. The head moves on the neck as a lever of the first kind; the first cervical vertebra forming the fulcrum. We rise on tiptoe by a lever of the second kind, the fulcrum being the ground under the toes; and we have examples of a lever of the third kind in the flexion of the forearm on the arm, in the elevation of the arm, &c.

Le'ver, Hysteromoch'lium, Mochlis'cus, Vec'tis obstetric''ius, Vec'tis, (F.) Levier, is an instrument curved at the extremity, and having a fenestra. It is used to assist the extraction of the child's head when instrumental aid is necessary, either as a lever proper or as a tractor. Levers are also used by the dentist for extracting stumps, &c. The Levier de l'Écluse, Langue de Carpe, Pied de biche, Pauch, is employed for extracting the molar teeth.

It is performed by putting substances already pulverized into water; the coarser parts are not long in being deposited, whilst the finer molecules remain suspended in the water. The liquor is decanted into another vessel, and suffered to remain at rest until the fine particles are collected at the bottom. The fluid part is then separated by decantation. See Elutriation.

Liche, Body.

Li'chen, gen. Liche'nis, (λειχην or λιχην, pronounced li'ken,) Exor'mia Li'chen, Lei'chen, Serpi'go, Volat'ica, Pap'ulæ, P. sic'cæ, Petі'go, Pus'tulæ sic'cæ, Scu'bies sic'ca seu a'gria, Licheni'asis adulto'rum, Li'chenous rash, (F.) Gale sèche, Dartre furfuracée volante, Poussée. The cutaneous affection described under this name by the Greek writers is not clearly defined. Some have believed it to be Impetigo, but this is doubtful. The name is now generally applied to a diffuse eruption of red pimples, accompanied by a troublesome sense of tingling or pricking. Drs. Willan and Bateman define it — "an extensive eruption of papulæ affecting adults, connected with internal disorder, usually terminating in scurf; recurrent, not contagious." One of their varieties, however, the Lichen Tropicus, does not accord well with this definition, for it affects children as well as adults, and is unconnected with internal disorder.

Li'chen A'grius, L. A'gria, Exor'mia Li'chen fe'rus, Li'chen fe'rus, Pap'ula a'gria, Wild Li'chen, is distinguished by pimples in clusters or patches, surrounded by a red halo; the cuticle growing gradually harsh, thickened, and chappy, often preceded by general irritation. In addition to antiphlogistics, a cooling ointment may be used, to allay itching.

Li'chen Barba'tus Plica'tus, L. plicatus.

Li'chen Circumscrip'tus is characterized by clusters or patches of papulæ, having a well defined margin, and an irregularly circular form, continuing for six or eight weeks. These varieties require but little medical treatment. The antiphlogistic plan is all that is necessary.

Li'chen Fe'rus, Lichen agrius.

Li'chen Gyra'tus. This is nothing more than the coalescence of several circles of lichen circumscriptus.

Li'chen Liv'idus. The papulæ have a dark red or livid hue, without any fever. They are more permanent in this variety. It requires the mineral acids and bark.

Li'chen, Net'tle, Lichen urticatus.

Li'chen Pila'ris, Exor'mia Li'chen pila'ris, is merely a modification of the preceding, the papulæ appearing at the roots of the hair.

Li'chen Pla'nus. A chronic eruption of crimson-red papules, flattened, smooth, described by Mr. E. Wilson as occurring on the front of the forearm above the wrist, the waist, place of attachment of the garter, etc.

Li'chen Prurigino'sus, see Strophulus.

Li'chen Sim'plex, Exor'mia Li'chen sim'plex, consists of an eruption of red papulæ, appearing first on the face or arms, and afterwards extending over the body, preceded for a few days by slight febrile irritation, which usually ceases when the eruption appears — with an unpleasant sense of tingling during the night. It generally dies away in ten days or a fortnight.

Li'chen Trop'icus, Exor'mia Li'chen trop'icus, Eczes'ma, Es'sera [?], Sudam'ina [?], Prick'ly heat, Sum'mer rash. The pimples are bright red, and of the size of a small pin's head, with heat, itching, and pricking, as if by needles. It is local, produced by excessive heat, and disappears when the weather becomes cooler, or the individual is inured to the climate. An eczematous affection called chunn, produced by the same cause as Lichen tropicus, is described by Tschudi as prevalent in the elevated plains of Peru.

Li'chen Urtica'tus, L. Urtico'sus, Exor'mia Li'chen urtico'sus, is another variety. The Net'tle Li'chen consists of papulæ accompanied by wheals, like those of nettle rash. A variety of this is said to be called, in America, blights.

The chief of this plant is as a blue dye. It has been employed to allay cough in phthisis, &c.

The blue pigment — Lit'mus — is much used as a delicate test for acid — in the urine for example. Blue Litmus paper is unsized paper steeped in tincture of litmus — which is made of Litmus powder, ʒj., Proof spirit, fʒx., and dried. It is reddened by acids. Red litmus paper is unsized paper steeped in tincture of litmus, which has been previously reddened by the addition of a very small quantity of sulphuric acid, and dried. Life, (Sax. lif, lyf,) Vi'ta, Bi'os, Bi'otē, Bi'otos, Zo'ē, Pneum'a, Spir'itus, (F.) Vie. The state of organized beings, during which, owing to the union of an unknown force with matter, they are capable of performing functions different from those that regulate other natural bodies; all of which functions, however numerous and diversified, work to one end. Life has only a limited duration; beyond which — the organic functions ceasing to be executed — the body is given up to the agency of chemical affinity. Hence Bichat has defined life to be — the aggregate of the functions which resist death. It is the vi'tal vor'tex of M. Quatrefages. On account of the difference that exists among the vital functions, he applied the term Organic Life to the functions inservient to composition and decomposition; as digestion, respiration, circulation, calorification, absorption, secretion, and nutrition: and Animal Life, to the functions which connect man and animals with external bodies; as the understanding, sensations, locomotion, and voice.
